The internal security of our country is dependent upon the strong position the Congress takes in forthcoming months to improve legislation. A jungle of immigration and naturalization laws exists, which must be brought into line with the needs of our national security.

Problems of finance and taxation are mounting daily.

A period of controls and regimentation is upon us, wherein the very principles of our national economic structure will be jeopardized, unless the most judicious consideration is given to legislation affecting it.

The weight and burden of our national and international affairs falls upon Foreign Relations, Armed Services, Judiciary, Appropriations, Finance, Banking and Currency, and those committees which we count as major, according to the necessities of the times.

Mr. President, I offer as a prime example the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member. Prior to the enactment of the Reorganization Act that committee had an authorized membership of 25.

The Reorganization Act—and let me say that I was here when it was passed and I took part in the debate—as it came to the floor of the Senate, proposed an across-the-board number of 13 members for each committee, regardless of the nature of the committee or of the extent of its workload. My friend, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee at that time, and still its honored chairman, opposed this unreasonable and impractical reduction in the membership of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

I refer to the colloquy on this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 7, 1946, volume 92, part 5, page 6451:

> Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to point out some very important provisions of the bill. Take for example, the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. That committee consists of 24 members at the present time, and I believe it is authorized to have 25 members. If the membership of that committee were reduced to 13 the committee would not be able to do its work.

To which Senator La Follette, the Senate sponsor of the Reorganization Act, later replied:

> I am prepared to increase the membership of the Appropriations Committee from 13 to 21.

A membership of 21 for the Appropriations Committee was finally approved after the able chairman of the committee showed it was a physical impossibility to do the work of the committee with a membership of 13 Senators.

This establishes the fact, Mr. President, that the determination of the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress to recommend an arbitrary, over-all figure of 13 members for each committee was not infallible.

The Congress recognized, in making the exception for the Appropriations Committee, that the work of a major committee may require a greater number of members than 13.

I point out further that in 1946, when the Reorganization Act was passed, it was hoped that we were heading into a peacetime economy. The budget which the Appropriations Committee had to consider at that time was $33,000,000,000.

That is when the workload, according to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, was so heavy that he remonstrated and said that 13 members could not do the work. Twenty-one members was the number agreed upon, but I am sure that if he had had his way we would have gone back to a membership of 25.

There are now 10 major subcommittees of the Senate Appropriations Committee. The committee is very well and properly organized. We have a very distinguished chairman. However, it is necessary for 10 subcommittees, organized within the Committee on Appropriations, to handle the work which comes to the committee in connection with appropriations. Each member of the Committee on Appropriations is assigned to at least four subcommittees, and, in some cases, Senators serve on five subcommittees. For example, the junior Senator from Nebraska is the ranking minority member on the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Interior and Insular Affairs. He sits also on four other subcommittees to help consider the work that comes before the committee.

Moreover, new sections of the consolidated appropriation, such as the foreign-aid programs, are considered by the full committee, which constitutes, in a sense, an eleventh subcommittee. There have been occasions in the schedule of subcommittee hearings during the past 6 years—and I have no objection, because it is impossible to do the work otherwise—when a Senator received notices to appear at three subcommittee meetings at the same time. Obviously a choice had to be made as to which meeting the Senator would attend, or he could give a few disjointed minutes to each one.

With this situation in mind, Mr. President, the Appropriations Committee today is faced with the prospect of a consolidated appropriation measure which may reach a total of at least $81,000,000,000, instead of $33,000,000,000, as in 1946, when the committee had a membership of 25.

The expansion from a $33,000,000,000 budget in 1946 to the possibility of $81,000,000,000 in 1951 is not nearly so illustrative of the vastly increased work of the Appropriations Committee, as are the expanding numbers of individual items on the budget which must be studied and passed upon by the committee.

Literally thousands of budget items support the complicated structure of our Federal Government, which, in the past decade, has become like the dragon's teeth in the fable. For every expense we try to eliminate, two new ones spring up in its place.

The Appropriations Committee will face this year's prospects with the same number of members apportioned to it as in 1946, and with four less members than it had when working on World War II appropriations.

Certainly this is true of many of the other major committees. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], made the statement the other day in the Committee on Rules and Administration, and I believe he also made it on the floor, that more than 50 percent of the legislation which comes to the floor of the Senate is reported by the Judiciary Committee. If that is not a correct statement, I should like to have the distinguished Senator from Nevada correct me.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that the workload of the Committee on the Judiciary during the two sessions of the Eighty-first Congress consisted of 40.9 percent of all bills and resolutions introduced in the Senate, 52.7 percent of all House bills and resolutions received from the House, and 44.1 percent of all bills and resolutions irrespective of their origin. Would the Senator permit me to insert at the conclusion of his address, or at this time, a statement which I had intended to make today setting forth in detail the work of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WHERRY. I deeply appreciate the aid of the distinguished Senator from Nevada, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the Senator from Nevada may be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The statement of Mr. McCARRAN appears at the conclusion of Mr. WHERRY's speech.)

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, getting back to the purposes of the Reorganization Act, we have a distinguished Member of the Senate who, when he was a Member of the House, managed the reorganization bill in the House, when former Senator La Follette managed it in the Senate. As I heard it explained, the prime purpose of the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress was to arrange the functions of the legislative branch so as more effectively to carry out its responsibilities under the Constitution.

Instead of having scattered authority among 81 committees of both Houses of Congress, it was intended to have a more compact formation and a clearer identification of the work area of each committee. That was its prime purpose.

In the recommendations of the joint committee, it is quite clear that an objective of the Reorganization Act was to strengthen and consolidate committee functions, rather than to limit the individual committee in any way.

Referring to the section on committee structure and operation, the joint committee's report states:

> Your committee believes that no adequate improvement in the organization of Congress can be undertaken or effected unless Congress first recognizes its present obsolete and overlapping committee structure. This is the first and most important test of whether Congress is willing to strengthen itself and its organization to carry the tremendous workload that present-day governmental problems place upon it.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Did the Senator from Nebraska, in outlining the duties of the membership of the Committee on Appropriations, include a reference to the ex officio members of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WHERRY. No; I did not. I should like to go into detail with respect to that subject. The Senator from Florida has made a very good point. There are six subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations to which ex officio members are appointed by other committees. They sit with the members of the Committee on Appropriations in considering appropriations affecting subjects within the jurisdiction of their committees. For example, if the Committee on Appropriations were considering appropriations for the armed services, three members of the Armed Services Committee would sit with the Committee on Appropriations. The same is true with respect to other ex officio members of the committee.

It goes to show—and perhaps the Senator from Florida mentioned it for that purpose—that the Appropriations Committee requires more members than the number now allotted to it. The ex officio members help tremendously in furnishing advice from their committees—and I do not know what we would do without them—but in order that the workload may be more evenly distributed, more members should be assigned to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. It is true, is it not, that the original terms of the Reorganization Act provided for ex officio members from six standing committees, three in number from each committee, to have full voting power on the appropriations dealing with their particular field?

Mr. WHERRY. I suggest to the Senator that the appointment of ex officio members was provided for prior to the Reorganization Act, and that it neither increased nor decreased the number of ex officio members.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator also think that, in addition to the help given by those three members from each of the six standing committees, to serve with full power as members of the Appropriations Committee in their respective fields, the provision of the Reorganization Act which requires that at least one of the three ex officio members in each field shall be assigned to the conference committee is likewise designed to help members of the Appropriations Committee carry the burden upon that committee?

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the Senator. I think that is a very good point. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is mistaken in stating that this practice began with the Reorganization Act. I believe that the original act authorizing the appointment of the ex officio members was passed in 1923. The Reorganization Act merely continued that plan. Of course, after the consolidation of the appropriation bills, there was some reason for such members not being appointed. But if we are to return to the departmental method of dealing with appropriations, it seems to me that it will be even more essential to continue the ex officio members. I hope the Senator's motion does not propose to interfere with such a plan.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I did not go into the question of ex officio members, because I did not think it was involved in the motion which I am about to make. The Senator from Florida raised the question, and I stated that the Reorganization Act also continued the appointment of the ex officio members. In answer to the Senator from Florida I stated that such a practice had been followed prior to the Reorganization Act. The practice was simply carried through.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. WHERRY. However, I think there was one difference. Under the Reorganization Act the ex officio members had a vote, while under the old practice they did not have a vote. Is not that true?

Mr. McKELLAR. They had a vote under both systems.

Mr. WHERRY. I was not sure about that; but that point was raised.

Mr. President, there are those members who believe strongly, and sincerely, I am sure, that any attempt to correct inequities under the Reorganization Act is tampering with the act to its ultimate destruction. I have heard that statement made. I know that those who make it are sincere. They have a right to their own opinion. But let me remind the Senators that it never was the intention of those who drafted the act that they were drafting a perfect piece of legislation, or that it was above amendment or further change.

Let me quote further from the report by the joint committee, page 2, section I, paragraph 3:

> We feel there is nothing sacrosanct in the present arrangement of our committees. A study of the committee system of both Houses reveals that since the First Congress the committees have undergone many realinements and changes as conditions demanded. As the "workshop of Congress," the committee structure more than any other arm of the legislative branch, needs frequent modernization to bring its efficiency up to the requirements of the day.

That language was in the report of the joint committee when the reorganization proposal was brought to the attention of the Senate; and the bill was passed with the assurance that from time to time the committees could be modernized, with respect to number, and other committees could be established. In that category come the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and certain other committees.

Mr. President, there is also nothing sacrosanct about the rule-changing privileges of the United States Senate. Those changes embodied in the Reorganization Act were enacted—and I quote from title I, paragraph (b), of the act:

> With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules—at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

Time after time, by unanimous consent, both the Senate and the House completely override their rules for a particular purpose, to expedite the work of the particular body. I hope the distinguished majority leader will continue that practice—

> With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules—at any time—

Today, tomorrow, next week, or next year—> in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

The Reorganization Act of 1946 established 15 standing committees in the Senate—in place of the former 33.

The relative importance of those committees is governed as much by the primary powers which the Constitution vests in the National Legislature as it is by the shift and increase in our legislative responsibilties.

Aside from the varying workload between committees—which may be numerically as great in a lesser committee as in a major committee—there are certain committees which the members themselves look upon as offering less opportunity for service. Senators have decided that question for themselves. The Reorganization Act itself takes cognizance of the fact that the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments are not as demanding in service as are other standing committees.

Personally I believe that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is a very important committee. I should like to serve upon it. Nevertheless, the Reorganization Act itself recognizes the fact that certain committees are not as demanding as others.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Does not the Senator feel that there has been a little too much emphasis, in the discussion by some Senators, with regard to whether or not a particular committee is more demanding than other committees? Each committee takes all the time a Senator can possibly devote to it. The question is whether or not the totality of work of a given committee requires more Members to do the job of that committee, in comparison with the totality of work of another committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Answering the distinguished Senator's question, I agree. I shall cover that point a little later. I shall be through in a few minutes. However, the point is pertinent here and I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I represent on the Appropriations Committee the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. I have been perfectly amazed at the length of time required for the consideration of the appropriations for that single department. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Nebraska that the membership of the Appropriations Committee ought to be increased, perhaps even beyond the point he has suggested.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am not myself classifying the committees. I am simply stating how Senators themselves have classified them. I agree with the Senator from Oregon that a Senator may serve an apprenticeship on the Committee on Rules and Administration, or on the Committee on the District of Columbia, or the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. There is plenty of work to do. So far as that is concerned, the committees are worked to death.

As I said, the Reorganization Act itself really takes recognition of the fact that the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments are not as demanding of service as are other Senate committees. In amending rule XXV of the Senate, section 102, subparagraph (F) (4) provides that—

Each Senator shall serve on two standing committees and no more; except that Senators of the majority party who are members of the Committee on the District of Columbia or of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments may serve on three standing committees and no more.

To these two lesser committees—and the classification is not my own—might also be added the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Committee on Rules and Administration, of which I am the ranking minority member. I say, some would so classify them, but I am not doing so.

That leaves eleven, let us say, more strategic committees, for which membership applications greatly exceed the possibility of gratifying them under present membership limitations, and under the prevailing seniority system.

It is my opinion—and the junior Senator from Nebraska has served on lesser committees as well as on two of the most important—that service on a less important committee can be of tremendous benefit to the individual member and to the Senate, if the necessary and demanding job is well done.

However, I have the greatest sympathy with Senators on this side of the aisle at least, who are not pleased with appointments to the lesser committees, unless they can have a position on one of the so-called major committees.

The minority assignments to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which are about to be made, constitute a perfect example of this situation. Prior to the time when, by telegram, the minority policy committee was able to get the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to change from one committee assignment to membership on the Committee on the District of Columbia, all six of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia were new members who had come to the Senate this year. With the change I have just mentioned, five of the six are new Senators, but all six minority members of the Committee on the District of Columbia are newly assigned to the committee, whether or not it happened to be one upon which they had selected to serve.

Of course, Mr. President, it is my opinion that an apprenticeship can be served as well on the Committee on the District of Columbia, as on other committees, so far as concerns the amount of time and effort that may be expended.

But it is perfectly natural that when a Senator is forced to serve on a committee, not of his own selection—whether major or minor—that Senator will make an effort to get off the committee as soon as possible.

Although a Senator may at times be "bumped" from a major committee, the main turn-over of service lies in the four so-called lesser committees, where there is a constant shifting of membership, and definite loss of experience in handling the work of those committees.

Continuity of service is of great value, if good legislation is to result.

Very often a Senator has found himself off of one committee and back on it again, in a period of 2 or 4 years, losing in the meantime a very valuable continuity of experience in the preparation of legislation.

How much better it would be, Mr. President, if a Member could have, to a greater degree, the selection of committees for which he asked, and for work on which he is specially qualified, or on which his work will be of greater value to the Senate.

I am heartily in favor of limiting the number of committees to which a Senator may be appointed, as the Reorganization Act now provides, but I am equally opposed to the restrictions upon membership, within the 15 committees, to the exclusion of manpower and talent, which the Senate so desperately needs at this very moment.

Mr. President, my purpose is only constructive, it is to expedite the work of the Senate. I serve on the Committee on Rules and Administration with the distinguished chairman of that committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. He knows as well as I do that the purpose of the measures acted on by that committee is constructive and that such measures should receive consideration of this body. They have no ulterior motive behind them. I happen to be a member of a major committee and of a minor committee. I was satisfied to give up membership on a major committee in order to make place for another Senator. It was the Committee on the Judiciary, and the change took place 4 years ago. The Senator appointed in my place has been a very valuable member of the Judiciary Committee. It illustrates how the solution of the problem can sometimes be reached. I think the time has come now when we should take steps adequately to distribute the workload.

These are times, Mr. President, when a Member of the United States Senate is entitled to feel that he needs to exert his very best efforts in the most effective manner possible.

These are times when it behooves the Senate to make it possible to utilize every ounce of its strength and talent, in the heavy responsibilities it faces, and to spread the workload in those committees which are more heavily burdened with defense legislation.

There is no attempt in anything I have to say, to evaluate one Senator's services above another, or to say where one Senator should be of more value than another. We are all needed to the fullest extent of our abilities.

My purpose is to recognize and to bring to some solution, the problem that some Senators are unduly burdened with the work of the Senate, while others feel that they are twiddling their thumbs while Rome burns.

Within the past 2 weeks, since the opening of the Eighty-second Congress, there have been at least four conferences, and other less formal discussions, between members of the majority and the minority, to try to work out a solution to this problem, on a voluntary basis. I think I am correct in that statement. I appreciate indeed the work the majority did in trying to help solve this problem.

By that I mean, the majority and minority could agree that membership on certain committees be increased, and membership on certain others be decreased.

I do not know that the membership of the lesser committees should be decreased, but I am certain that the membership of some committees should be increased; and if the only way to obtain an increase of membership on the 11 or 12 major committees is to decrease membership on the lesser committees, I think the time has arrived when that should be done.

On a voluntary basis, of course, it would take unanimous consent to make such changes on a temporary basis at least. It was the hope of the junior Senator from Nebraska, as ranking minority member on the Rules and Administration Committee, that some solution such as that suggested could be worked out.

Unfortunately the effort has failed, in spite of the fact that members from both sides of the aisle worked earnestly and sincerely to accomplish this purpose. I want to pay them tribute for that.

The Senate might have been able to accomplish by voluntary agreement, what has already been accomplished by the House in the past few days.

On January 12, Representative MCCORMACK offered a resolution (H. Res. 60) for immediate consideration by the House, which was agreed to, without objection.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that House Resolution 60, which I have designated as exhibit A, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution, marked "Exhibit A," was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT A

COMPOSITION OF VARIOUS COMMITTEES

Resolved, That during the Eighty-second Congress the Committee on Agriculture shall be composed of 30 members;

The Committee on Appropriations shall be composed of 50 members;

The Committee on Armed Services shall be composed of 35 members;

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments shall be composed of 27 members;

The Committee on Foreign Affairs shall be composed of 2[illegible] members;

The Committee on House Administration shall be composed of 23 members;

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall be composed of 30 members;

The Committee on the Judiciary shall be composed of 29 members;

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries shall be composed of 27 members;

The Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall be composed of 23 members;

The Committee on Public Lands shall be composed of 27 members; and

The Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall be composed of 23 members.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the House has already recognized the necessity for strengthening its major committees, with increased memberships to meet the pressures of the times.

The House has recognized that it has manpower that should be utilized where it will have the greatest advantage and afford the greatest relief to hard-pressed committees.

Five Members have been added to the House Committee on Appropriations. The House had previously added two positions to that committee in the Eighty-first Congress, increasing the membership then from 43 to 45. Now, in the Eighty-second Congress, the House Committee on Appropriations will have 50 members.

The House resolution has increased the House Committee on Agriculture by three members; the Armed Services Committee by two members; the Foreign Relations Committee by two members; the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee by three members; and the Judiciary Committee by two members. Increases in membership were also given to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries; to the Committee on Public Lands; and to the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments.

At the same time, the House resolution cuts back membership on the House Committee on Administration; on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service; and on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, which is a separate committee in the House.

The House has done, on a voluntary basis, exactly what the junior Senator from Nebraska had hoped might be done in the Senate.

Mr. President, at this moment we are faced with the assignment of Senators to committees for the duration of the Eighty-second Congress. Lacking a voluntary action, such as that taken by the House, in the form a resolution to which there was unanimous agreement, there is only one way remaining to improve the situation in time to be of some use and service in the Eighty-second Congress.

Of course, there is the means of amending the Reorganization Act. That is an approach with which I am in fundamental accord, and I have prepared a resolution which I submit to accomplish that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 31) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That (1) paragraph (b) of section 1 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to the Committee on Appropriations, is amended by striking out "twenty-one" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-three."

(2) Paragraph (f) of such section, relating to the Committee on the District of Columbia, is amended by striking out "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "eleven."

(3) Paragraph (g) of such section, relating to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, is amended by striking out "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "eleven."

(4) Paragraph (i) of such section, relating to the Committee on Foreign Relations, is amended by striking out "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "fifteen."

(5) Paragraph (k) of such section, relating to the Committee on the Judiciary, is amended by striking out "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "fifteen."

(6) Paragraph (o) of such section, relating to the Committee on Rules and Administration, is amended by striking out "thirteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "eleven."

Mr. WHERRY. I hope that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration will assign it to a subcommittee; and after the hearings which I hope will be had, I trust we shall subsequently receive from the Committee on Rules and Administration a proposal for a change which will be of service to the Congress in 1952. Such a further step will be necessary, because the motion I am making today does not provide for a permanent change.

As I have said, the resolution will take time.

The only way that I see to be of immediate service to the Eighty-second Congress in this respect and to adjust the situation, at least to the degree now possible, is to amend the pending order so as to provide for an increased membership of at least one major committee for the duration of the Eighty-second Congress.

If that motion prevails, I intend to follow it with corresponding motions to decrease the membership of at least one other committee. In other words, there would be no increases in the membership of other committees; but instead of having 13 members on the Committee on the District of Columbia, for instance, there might be 11, inasmuch as the proposed change of membership of the Appropriations Committee would be from 21, as of the present time, to 23.

This effort is being made on my part, with the sincere purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Senate and of providing the broadest possible use, on a temporary basis, at least—because the resolution would apply only to the Eighty-second Congress—of the talents of Senate Members.

It would have been most helpful and encouraging to the combined efforts of this great body, and in the interests of greater unanimity and cooperation in the work of the Senate, if the distinguished majority leader, the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND] had chosen to offer, for voluntary action by the Senate, a resolution which would have made the necessary additions to the memberships of the major committees, and reductions in certain others. I should like to have seen him do so, because if there ever was a time when a gesture which would provide unanimity on the part of all Members of the Senate was needed, it is now.

It would have been wonderful if the Senate could have done that voluntarily, by means of unanimous consent; and I know that the minority would have "hailed the chief" as a great and outstanding majority leader if that could have been accomplished. However, the distinguished majority leader, in his wisdom, and we have to acknowledge that as majority leader he has to thresh out these things—did not see fit to do so.

So, Mr. President, at this time I have made the motion. It affects only the Eighty-second Congress, and does not propose a permanent amendment of the rule. A permanent amendment should be made by means of a proposal reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration itself. However, the present motion is one to increase by two members the membership of the Appropriations Committee in the Eighty-second Congress.

As I have stated, I do not wish to say anything about the qualifications of other Senators; but I desire to say to the majority that if we submit for membership on the Appropriations Committee the names of an additional Senator or two, we would suggest the names of Senators who have had many years of experience in the making of appropriations in the House of Representatives. Why should we wait? Why make those members serve an apprenticeship on the Committee on the District of Columbia, which, in terms of workload, does not compare with the Appropriations Committee, and make them wait for years before they, who have had years of service on the Appropriations Committee in the House of Representatives, can give their talents and their ability to the Senate committee which will handle appropriations in the Eighty-second Congress.

Mr. President, I take this step in an effort to be constructive, and in good faith. I should like to have the motion voted on as soon as possible. If the motion is defeated—and I say this to be fair to the majority leader—no more motions will be offered by me.

After the majority leader answers the argument I have made, if he cares to do so, why can we not vote on this one motion, and then organize the Senate? Then those who wish to speak on foreign policy matters can be recognized in the order in which they address the Chair.

(The statement by Senator MCCARRAN, which, on request of Mr. WHERRY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD following his speech is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MCCARRAN

From time to time I have reported to the Senate concerning the work of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor to be chairman.

I have done this not only because I have felt the Senate was entitled to such periodic reports but also because I have wanted my colleagues to have an understanding of the volume of work which the Committee on the Judiciary is required to do.

Nothing that I have said in connection with previous reports of this nature, and nothing I say today, is intended or should be taken as a complaint in any sense of the word. It is my pleasure to have associated with me on the Judiciary Committee some of the ablest and most hard-working Members of the Senate. As a committee, we have the assistance of a very fine and hard-working committee staff, and the Senate, in its wisdom, has in the past made provision for increased staff assistance for the Committee on the Judiciary.

When Congress enacted the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, it was anticipated that the work of the Committee on the Judiciary, in some categories, would decline and eventually taper off. Two important categories with regard to which this expectation was entertained were private immigration bills and private claims bills. As I think my colleagues realize, the expectation was not borne out with respect to either of these categories of bills. On the contrary, there has been an increase in the number of bills in each category in each session of the Congress since 1946.

There is, I believe, still some hope of an eventual decline in the number of private claims bills; but the decline has not set in and is not likely to be evidenced during the session which has just begun.

I am hopeful that the omnibus immigration and naturalization bill, which is one of the major projects in which the Judiciary Committee is now engaged, will include provisions which may help in reducing the number of private immigration bills in the future; but that reduction also, if accomplished, will not come during the present session of the Congress.

It seems quite certain, therefore, that the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to discharge properly its duties and responsibilities, will have to ask the Senate to provide additional assistance in this Congress to at least the same degree in which it has been provided in the past; and if the Senate sees fit to impose new and additional duties upon the Judiciary Committee, further provision will then have to be made for staff assistance in connection with such duties. But I want the Senate to know that the additional assistance which has been provided for the Committee on the Judiciary has been well employed, and is aiding the committee to produce as the Senate has a right to expect.

Here, then, is a statistical report on the work of the Judiciary Committee during the Eighty-first Congress:

"SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE WORK AND WORKLOAD, EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS, FIRST AND SECOND SESSIONS

"The workload of the Senate Judiciary Committee during the two sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, consisted of 40.9 percent of all Senate bills and resolutions introduced; 52.7 percent of all House bills and resolutions presented in the Senate; 44.1 percent of all bills and resolutions irrespective of origin.

"Not only has the Judiciary Committee received a far larger share of the Senate's total workload than any other standing committee of the Senate; it has also performed a larger share of all committee work than any other committee. Of 2,701 written reports filed in the Senate by all committees, the Judiciary Committee has filed 1,417, which represents 52.4 percent.

"The total of reports filed to the Senate does not give the whole picture of committee activity, because committee consideration of many bills resulted in adverse action and indefinite postponement. Furthermore, the committee has handled and disposed of more than 4,716 individual immigration cases, involving suspension of deportation. Each immigration case is equivalent to a bill.

"During both sessions of the Eighty-first Congress, the Judiciary Committee has received 2,039 Senate bills and resolutions and 959 House bills and resolutions, making a total of 2,998 bills and resolutions.

"As of the close of the Eighty-first Congress, the committee had disposed of 1,659 Senate bills and resolutions and 917 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 2,576 bills and resolutions.

"Of the bills thus disposed of 276 were general bills other than claims or immigration, 938 were private relief bills, 1,274 were private immigration bills, 31 were general claims bills, and 57 were general immigration bills.

"Committee approval was granted to 647 Senate bills and resolutions and 783 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 1,430 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

"(It will be noted that written reports were filed by the committee with respect to all but 13 of the 1,430 bills and resolutions approved.)

"Of the bills and resolutions acted upon favorably 149 were general bills other than claims or immigration, 574 were private relief bills, 674 were private immigration bills, 20 were general claims bills, and 13 were general immigration bills.

"Bills indefinitely postponed by the committee included 1,012 Senate bills and resolutions, 134 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 1,146 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

"Of the bills thus acted upon unfavorably 127 were general bills other than claims or immigration, 364 were private relief bills, 600 were private immigration bills, 44 were general immigration bills, and 11 were general claims bills.

"Measures pending before the committee at the close of the Eighty-first Congress included 380 Senate bills and resolutions and 42 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 422 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

"Of these bills 102 are general bills other than immigration and claims, 96 are private relief bills, 209 are private immigration bills, 7 are general claims bills, and 8 are general immigration bills.

"Committee action, in most cases, must await reports from interested departments and agencies in the executive branch. When the Eighty-first Congress adjourned sine die, the number of bills and resolutions pending before the committee, with respect to which reports had been requested, but not received, was 225, of which 29 were general bills other than claims or immigration, 36 were private relief bills, and 160 were private immigration bills.

"Thus it will be seen that out of the 2,998 bills and resolutions referred to the committee, the number of cases in which the committee has not acted but in which the committee either had received the reports or deemed reports unnecessary, totaled only 197, of which 73 were general bills other than claims or immigration, 60 were private relief bills, 49 were private immigration bills, 7 were general claims bills, and 8 were general immigration bills.

"It will be noted the committee disposed of 917 House bills and resolutions out of 959 such measures referred to it, leaving only 42 House bills and resolutions pending. This means the committee took action on 95.6 percent of all House measures received.

"In comparison, out of 2,039 Senate bills and resolutions referred to it, the committee acted upon 1,659, leaving 380 Senate bills and resolutions pending. This means that although the committee had to "start from scratch" in all such cases, action was taken on 81.3 percent of all Senate measures received.

"(In this connection it should be noted the committee received 53 Senate bills and 5 House bills subsequent to the reconvening of the Congress on November 27, 1950.)

"Suspension of deportation by the Attorney General, under authority delegated by the Congress, are reported to the Congress in groups; but in the committee, each such individual case requires separate investigation, appraisal, and action. At the beginning of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, there were pending in the committee 1,501 cases of suspension of deportation, to which were added 6,037 additional cases submitted during the Eighty-first Congress, making a total of 7,538 cases, of which 4,716 were approved, 59 were rejected, and 10 were withdrawn by the Attorney General; leaving 2,753 cases in process.

"During the Eighty-first Congress, the committee received 264 executive nominations, of which 117 were Federal judges, 61 were United States district attorneys, 60 were United States marshals, 1 was Attorney General of the United States, 1 was Assistant Solicitor General, 5 were Assistant Attorneys General, 1 was Commissioner of Patents, 4 were members of the Displaced Persons Commission, 4 were members of the War Claims Commission, 5 were members of the Motor Carrier Claims Commission, and 5 were members of the Subversive Activities Control Board.

"Nominations not acted upon totaled only 11, all of which were received in committee between November 27 and December 21, 1950.

"During the Eighty-first Congress, the committee and its subcommittees conducted 190 hearings, which involved 330 separate hearing sessions. The records of these hearings total 36,991 folios."

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the title of the Reorganization Act, namely, "To provide for increased efficiency in the legislative branch of the Government."

The Joint Committee on Reorganization of the legislative branch spent many months in studying this problem. They heard expert witnesses, had the benefit of thorough studies, and took much evidence. They carefully considered all the questions the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska has pointed out.

Mr. President, each of the committees is supposed to be a major committee. Some persons may differ as to that view; some Senators may not think that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, for instance, is so important. However, the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] believes it is a very important committee, and he has often referred to the work done by that committee and to the workload it has.

Another committee which might be mentioned in this connection is the Committee on Rules and Administration. If we are going to change the rules of the Senate by action taken on the floor of the Senate, without referring such matters to the Committee on Rules and Administration, we might as well do away with that committee. As chairman of the committee, we have my colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], a distinguished Senator who has served many years in this body. No one is more familiar with the workings of the Senate than he.

We have as the ranking minority member of that committee my distinguished friend, the minority leader, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. I concede that he knows a great deal about the workings of the United States Senate and about how it should be organized.

Furthermore, each one of the other members of the Committee on Rules and Administration is qualified to pass upon these very important problems. I call attention to the fact that recently a new member has been added to that committee, in accordance with the list recently submitted, namely, the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr.

MONRONEY], who in the House of Representatives handled the Legislative Reorganization Act prior to its passage.

Mr. President, at this time I do not wish to discuss the merits of the motion, because I feel that the Committee on Rules and Administration should carefully consider all the arguments which have been made by the distinguished minority leader; and then, after carefully considering all of them and also carefully considering others which may be made and evidence which may be introduced, it should make its report to this body.

I contend that this motion is an attempt, without changing the rule, to amend rule XXV, which provides the number of members of the respective committees.

Therefore, Mr. President, I make a point of order against——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, is the Senator going to make the point of order at once?

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment, to permit me to make a statement at this time?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a moment, if I may do so without losing the floor. I ask unanimous consent that I may do so without losing the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if this motion is directed at the committee, of which I happen to be chairman, I wish to say that of course I desire to get along with the junior Senator from Nebraska. He is on the committee, and is a very valuable member of it, and I always like to agree with him whenever I can. However, the Appropriations Committee now has 21 regular members and, in addition, 18 ex officio members, each of whom has a part in the deliberations of the committee. If my mathematics is correct, 21 and 18 make 39. In other words, there are 39 members of the committee, which is more than one-third of the membership of the Senate. In my judgment, it would make the committee too large.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Nebraska, for the purpose of his addressing a question to the Senator from Tennessee, without losing my right to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished chairman of the committee agrees with me, does he not, that prior to the passage of the Legislative Reorganization Act, there was the same number of ex officio members of the committee, and that, therefore, there was no increase in the number of ex officio members?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct. Let me say that I think the present procedure a very fine method of handling appropriations, but a better way would be to go back to the old plan of handling appropriations through subcommittees on the War Department, the Navy Department, and the various other departments. I hope and pray that we may return to that system, instead of having an enormous committee consisting of 39 members.

Mr. WHERRY. It would not be 39, would it?

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be 39. Twenty-one and eighteen make thirty-nine. There are 18 ex officio members. Six times three is 18. Therefore, if we were to agree to the motion of my able friend across the aisle, we would increase our committee by how many? How many would the Senator increase it?

Mr. WHERRY. By two.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would make 41 members. That is certainly a very unwieldy number. The Senator will agree with me that, with the exception of one, that exception being myself, the Appropriations Committee as now constituted is one of the best committees of the Senate. The committee has worked with remarkable skill and ability, even under the system of a unified or consolidated appropriation bill, which entirely upset all the experience which had preceded it, and disregarded the customary methods of handling appropriations. Even so, the committee has worked well, even though there has been an immense amount of work. I hope and pray that we may not change the practice at this particular time. I agree with the majority leader that it would be better to have the matter go to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and let that committee report later, if it should desire to do so. The change should not be made now. Let the present procedure continue at least until we get back to the nonunified scheme of handling appropriation bills.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield, with the same understanding.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not a fact that the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, had served with the same number of ex officio members on six subcommittees—making a total of 18—prior to the passage of the Legislative Reorganization Act, when there were 25 members of the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not remember how many there were.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator's statement was that there were 25 active members of the Senate Appropriations Committee, prior to the passage of the Legislative Reorganization Act, together with six subcommittees being served by three ex officio members each. Therefore, to go from 21 to 23 would still be 2 short of what the distinguished Senator had as a committee prior to the passage of the Legislative Reorganization Act, at a time when the budget was only $33,000,000,000 instead of $81,000,000,000, as may be today.

Mr. McKELLAR. My good friend is mistaken about the situation. Let me explain it to him.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Legislative Reorganization Act provided for was a return to 13 members. I opposed that.

Mr. WHERRY. How many were on the committee—25?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think there were 25. Twenty-five were authorized.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that there were that many serving.

Mr. WHERRY. But there was an authorized membership of 25.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct. We finally agreed on 21, which was an excellent decision. It has worked well. Why change a situation which has worked well? The present practice has worked splendidly, and I may say that is largely due to the fine staff which serves the committee. It has worked very well, so why change it? We might just as well include the entire membership of the Senate, the entire 96 Senators, on the Appropriations Committee. Incidentally, we may come to that, if we start the practice suggested.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McKELLAR. In a moment. Let us stand by what has worked well. I have been a member of the committee I think for more than a quarter of a century, or about that long, and I may say that the greatest test which has ever been made of our method of handling appropriations was when our friends in the House sent us the unified appropriation bill. It was a severe test of the efficient working of our committee. The committee met the test. It did everything that could be done. Senators from both sides of the aisle did everything in the world they could to make the plan a success; but it was not a success. Now, when we are returning to the practice of considering the separate deparments in the handling of appropriation bills, as we probably shall, why not take the method which has been tried and has been found to be successful and effective in every way? Why should we experiment with 41 members, or nearly one-half of the membership of the Senate, on one committee?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McKELLAR. In a moment. Let me appeal to my friend, let us not in this haphazard way change the committee at this time. I appeal to the Senator as my friend. I appeal to him as a legislator. I appeal to him as a good Republican. [Laughter.] I appeal to him in every way. He is a good Republican. As a good Democrat, to a good Republican, I ask whether the Senator will not withdraw his motion, and allow us to employ the method and to use the plan which has been so successful in the past.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield, with the same understanding.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator remember that on June 7, 1946, he made this observation on the floor of the Senate, when the Legislative Reorganization Act was reported to the Senate, and when the Appropriations Committee was reduced from 25 members to 13? The Senator said:

I wish to point out some very important provisions of the bill. Take for example the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

That committee was then handling a budget of $33,000,000,000. The Senator continued:

The committee consists of 24 members at the present time, and I believe it is authorized to have 25. If the membership of that committee were reduced to 13, the committee would not be able to do its work.

I am making the same argument the Senator made at that time, but instead of suggesting 25 members, I am suggesting 23. The Senator felt that certainly there should be a committee of 25, but subsequently there was agreement with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee to reduce the membership from 25 to 21.

Mr. McKELLAR. We agreed to that. It worked well. Why change it now on the floor of the Senate without the matter going to a committee? In my opinion, it ought not to be changed. I have the greatest respect, admiration, and esteem for my good friend from Nebraska. He works with me on the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I work with a good Democrat.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is one of the most valuable members we have on the committee. I ask him not to revolutionize the committee at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Arizona yield for a moment further.

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The committee has lost a member. I am very sorry it has lost one. There are still 21 members of the committee, but the Democrats have lost one.

Mr. WHERRY. Why did the Democrats lose one?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because of the elections on November 7; that is why. When the people speak, they come ahead of any of us. The Republican vacancies have been filled. The place of former Senator Gurney has been filled by our Republican friends. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] have been selected as members of the committee. The Republicans have three new members of the committee. They are taking care of their friends. They have an opportunity, so far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, of placing three new members on it, while the Democrats have lost a member of the committee.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate. I have appealed to my friend from Nebraska and he does not seem to be yielding, so I appeal to the Members of the Senate to leave the committee as it is. We try in that committee to work out problems along practical lines, irrespective of party or faction.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I think the colloquy has clearly demonstrated that the rules of the Senate should not be amended in this manner. So I make the point of order which I previously stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish to argue the point of order?

Mr. McFARLAND. No, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska wish to argue it?

Mr. WHERRY. No; I do not. If there is any way in which we can get the opinion of the Chair, I shall promise, on this side, not to exceed 10 minutes in getting the matter out of the way and getting the Senate organized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Prior to the passage of the Reorganization Act, there was one very definite rule of the Senate in regard to the number of members of each committee. There was no rule at all as to how many committees a Senator might be a member of. In order to distribute the membership on major committees as widely as possible among the Members of the Senate, the Reorganization Act provided that no Senator should be a member of more than two major committees, except that members of the majority might be on one or two additional committees which were named. It also provided for the number of members of each committee. The Reorganization Act, however, provides that each House may determine its own rules; in other words, that each House may amend its rules as it may see fit in regard to members of the committees or the number of major committees of which a Senator may be a member.

The Chair is not concerned personally as to whether there shall be 21 or 23 members of the Appropriations Committee. However, inasmuch as it is a rule of the Senate that the committee shall be composed of 21 members, the Chair is of the opinion that in order to increase the number of members of that committee, the rule must be changed. In other words, if the Senate places 23 Senators on that committee, in the view of the Chair it would be a violation of rule XXV which provides that 21 members shall constitute the membership of the Appropriations Committee.

The rule provides the method by which it may be amended, and the Chair feels that until the rule is amended authorizing an increase in the membership of the Committee on Appropriations from 21 to 23, it is not in order to increase the number from 21 to 23.

The same logic would apply to any other committee. If a resolution or an amendment were offered to make the Committee on Finance a commmittee of 15 Senators instead of 13, the Chair would feel that in order for that to be done the rule fixing 13 members as the number would have to be changed. The rule provides how it may be done.

Therefore, the Chair is of the opinion that the motion is not in order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that forces the junior Senator from Nebraska to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I do not want to debate it at length. I desire to raise only two points, and then I shall be willing to have a vote on the appeal, which would be the same thing, really, as a vote on the motion. I do this with a great deal of reluctance, because I do not, at the beginning of the session, want to take exception to a ruling of the Chair. I have great affection for the Vice President, as he knows, but I have no other way to get a vote on the increased membership of committees than to prosecute the question as far as I can from a parliamentary point of view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair fully understands that.

The Chair meant to make a further observation, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit. If the Senate can increase the number of members of a committee merely by an amendment to a resolution, it can by a similar process increase the number of major committees of which a Senator can be a member. Therefore, without amending the rules in an orderly way, the Senate could complete the organization of a committee by an amendment of this sort.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I would not want the RECORD to show that the Senator from Nebraska was doing this with any ulterior motive in mind, or that I am trying to gain the end result of a change in the rule only for the purpose of satisfying the desire of the Senator from Nebraska by using parliamentary procedure unfairly. All the Senate would be doing would be to vote on increasing the membership of the Committee on Appropriations for the Eighty-second Congress by two members, and decreasing, if this motion should be adopted, the membership of the Committee on the District of Columbia by two members. This would make the membership of the Committee on Appropriations 23, and the membership of the Committee on the District of Columbia 11.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee has made a strong appeal that the Senator from Nebraska join with him. Let me say there is not a Member of the Senate for whom I have a higher regard than I have for the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. In most instances, even without the flattering remarks he made about the Senator from Nebraska, I go along with his judgment and requests. But I submit that the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, before the Reorganization Act was passed, rose on the floor of the Senate and used the very arguments which I am now using, not only to preserve the membership of the Appropriations Committee at 25, but not to pass the Reorganization Act if it provided for an Appropriations Committee of 13 members. Former Senator La Follette met with the distinguished Senator and a compromise was made on 21 members.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the compromise was made in the enactment of the law.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with that statement.

Mr. HAYDEN. It was not an effort to change the law by a simple resolution in the Senate, when the proper way to change it is by an amendment to the rule.

Mr. WHERRY. The way to do it is the way which I have attempted to do it, namely, to offer a resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I hope that before this session is concluded the Senator will join with me in reporting a rule which will correct the situation. I agree with the Senator that so far as the permanent rules are concerned, that is the way to correct the situation.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration will also agree with me that title I of the Reorganization Act provides that, with full recognition of its constitutional right, either House may change its rules at any time it desires to do so. Is that not correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. The way to change a rule is to do it through the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. WHERRY. But title I of the act provides that even though the way to make a permanent change is through the committee, the Senate can change a rule at any time it wants to do so. It can do it now if it wants to do so. The Senator from Arizona knows that many times he has asked for unanimous consent, as probably most of us have done, to change a rule of the Senate, and unanimous consent was given and the change was made for a particular purpose. That is different from asking for a permanent change. I have made such an approach also. However, it will not help the situation at the present time.

If the Eighty-second Congress is to get the benefit of the services of new Senators, who are eager to help the Senate do its work, we should amend the rule and increase the membership of the Committee on Appropriations. It can be done by taking the two additional members from the Committee on the District of Columbia. We have the right to do it.

I disagree with the ruling of the Presiding Officer. Title I of the Reorganization Act fully recognizes the right of the Senate to change its rules at any time it wishes to do so. I am not asking for a permanent change in the rule at this time. I am asking only that the change be made for the Eighty-second Congress. I ask that the membership of the Appropriations Committee be increased to 23 members. So far as the junior Senator from Nebraska is concerned the Senate can vote on the appeal from the Chair whenever the majority leader is ready to do so.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I am willing to have the Senate vote on the appeal from the ruling of the Chair. I hope that the ruling of the Chair will be sustained. However, before doing so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Chapman	Ferguson
Anderson	Chavez	Flanders
Bennett	Clements	Frear
Benton	Connally	Fulbright
Brewster	Cordon	George
Bricker	Dirksen	Gillette
Bridges	Douglas	Green
Butler, Md.	Dworshak	Hayden
Butler, Nebr.	Eastland	Hendrickson
Carlson	Ecton	Hennings
Case	Ellender	Hill
Holland	McClellan	Saltonstall
Humphrey	McFarland	Schoeppel
Hunt	McKellar	Smathers
Ives	McMahon	Smith, Maine
Jenner	Martin	Smith, N. J.
Johnson, Colo.	Millikin	Smith, N. C.
Johnson, Tex.	Monroney	Stennis
Johnston, S. C.	Morse	Taft
Kefauver	Mundt	Thye
Kerr	Murray	Watkins
Kilgore	Neely	Welker
Knowland	Nixon	Wherry
Langer	O'Conor	Wiley
Lehman	O'Mahoney	Williams
Lodge	Pastore	Young
Long	Robertson
McCarran	Russell

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is absent on official business.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] are absent on public business.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM]. If present and voting the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea," and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] is paired on this vote with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY]. If present and voting, the Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

If present and voting, the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] would vote "yea."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

On this vote the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay" and the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea."

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] is absent because of a death in his family.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] who is necessarily absent in order to attend the funeral of a friend is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay" and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea."

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—44

Anderson	Hennings	McFarland
Benton	Hill	McKellar
Chapman	Holland	McMahon
Chavez	Humphrey	Monroney
Clements	Hunt	Murray
Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Neely

NOT VOTING—13

Byrd	Kem	Sparkman
Cain	McCarthy	Tobey
Capehart	Magnuson	Vandenberg
Hickenlooper	Malone
Hoey	Maybank

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the order making the committee assignments.

The order was agreed to.

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 30)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Joint Committee on the Economic Report:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1951.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIRS: I am presenting herewith my Economic Report to the Congress, as required under the Employment Act of 1946.

In preparing this report, I have had the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers, members of the Cabinet, and heads of independent agencies.

Together with this report, I am transmitting a report, the Annual Economic Review: January 1951, prepared for me by the Council of Economic Advisers in accordance with section 4 (c) (2) of the Employment Act of 1946.

Respectfully,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE BUDGET (H. DOC. NO. 17)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the budget message of the President, which, he is informed, has been read in the House of Representatives, and therefore there is no need that it be read for publication again in the Senate. The message from the President and the budget will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(For message from the President, see pp. 271–288, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, House proceedings of today.)

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET—STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement I have prepared commenting on the budget for expenditures in 1951 submitted to the Congress today by the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Only a week ago the President appeared before Congress and said: "It (the Government) must practice rigid economy in its nondefense activities. Many of the things we would normally do must be curtailed or postponed."

The applause for this section of the State of the Union address was greater than for any other statement, indicating Congress accepted this policy in good faith.

Yet, today he has submitted to Congress a budget which has actually increased nondefense spending to the highest level in the history of the Nation—whether in peace or in war.

Not only has he, in the time of our greatest crisis, failed to keep his pledge for a rigid reduction in nondefense spending, but the President renews his advocacy of the socialistic measures known as the Fair Deal.

He calls for an increase in taxation of from $16,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000 annually and still proposes to continue wasteful domestic spending which has added billions to the public debt.

He asks citizens to make deep sacrifices in their daily living, yet he declines to make political sacrifices by curtailment or suspension of measures for the distribution of public funds for nonessential purposes.

In my experience of 18 years, considering the perils that confront our Nation, this message represents the very height of fiscal irresponsibility.

Unity and the sacrifices necessary to save our country must be a two-way street—they must come from the Government as well as from the citizens.

On page M41 of the budget message he renews his support of the Brannan plan, which, if adopted, will add billions to Federal expenditures and disrupt the processes of agricultural production. It is true that he asks for no appropriation at this time for the Brannan plan but, should the principle of the Brannan plan be adopted, huge appropriations will necesarily follow.

On page M54 he advocates a specific appropriation of $300,000,000 for Federal aid to public schools which will open up a pandora box of Federal spending the extent of which no one can foretell.

On page M52 he recommends the so-called socialized medicine plan, with provisions for funds through new taxes which obviously will be inadequate. The adoption of the principle of this plan will be followed by vast expenditures.

On page M30 he recommends establishment of the Fair Employment Practices Commission, which, if established, will not only be costly but will result in Federal interference with every man's business.

My statement today will deal with the domestic, civilian nondefense expenditures only.

The President recommends a total of $9,800,000,000 for domestic civilian purposes, as compared with estimated expenditures of $8,400,000,000 in the current year, an actual expenditure of $9,700,000,000 in 1950, $6,100,000,000 in 1948, and $3,600,000,000 in 1946.

In fiscal 1946, beginning July 1, 1945, we were partly at war, with conditions similar to those confronting us today, and the President now proposes to spend for domestic civilian expenditures nearly three times as much as in fiscal 1946.

To this statement I attach explanatory notes.

Within a day or so I will present to Congress an itemized statement of the reductions and increases made in the President's budget, as compared with previous expenditures, and will submit detailed plans as to how these expenditures could be reduced, in accordance with my letter to the President under date of December 22.

Expenditure budget comparisons

Expenditure categories	Actual, 1948 [1]	Actual, 1950	Estimate, 1951	President's requests, 1952
1. Domestic-civilian [2] (exclusive of stockpile, NACA, Selective Service, merchant marine, Coast Guard, Alaska, Panama, Atomic Energy)	$6.1	$9.7	$8.4	$9.8
2. Foreign assistance (military and economic)	4.6	4.6	4.7	7.5
3. Defense (including military, stockpile, NACA, Selective Service, merchant marine, Coast Guard, Alaska, Panama, Atomic Energy)	11.6	13.4	22.6	43.4
4. Veterans	6.6	6.6	5.7	4.9
5. Interest, claims, etc	5.2	5.8	5.7	5.9
6. Legislative and Judicial	.1	.1	.1	.1
Total	34.2	40.2	47.2	71.6

[1] Fiscal year 1948 is included in this table because it comes most nearly representing the post World War II peacetime era and peacetime prosperity.

Domestic-civilian expenditures by major categories

NOTE.—The following table breaks down item 1 above.

Domestic-civilian increases and decreases	Actual, 1946 [1]	Actual, 1950	Estimate, 1951	President's requests, 1952
1. Social welfare, health, and security	$1,085	$2,213	$2,520	$2,625
2. Housing and community development	−180	261	409	−102
3. Education and general research	88	114	143	483
4. Agriculture and agricultural resources	701	2,784	986	1,429
5. Natural resources (exclusive of atomic energy)	257	1,004	1,301	1,244
6. Transportation (exclusive of Merchant Marine, Coast Guard, Panama, and Alaska)	413	1,752	1,426	1,073
7. Finance, commerce, and industry	102	227	368	1,524
8. Labor	192	263	212	295
9. General government (exclusive of interest, refunds, claims)	933	1,037	1,082	1,229
Total	3,591	9,655	8,437	9,834

[1] Fiscal year 1946 is used because we were in a semiwar economy at that time as well as now. Then we were descending from the wartime requirements, now we are ascending in these aspects. At that time we still had controls such as those under OPA and we were negotiating to cancel contracts. Now we are building up control agencies and making loans to business for defense production.

NOTES

In connection with the preceding tables and the President's budget message in general, it may be noted:

1. The President requests $71,600,000,000 in expenditures, and $55,100,000,000 in revenue. Deficit $16,500,000,000.

2. He says the budget must be balanced and that he will submit requests for additional taxes at a later date.

3. The President requests $7,500,000,000 in foreign assistance (military and economic aid together) as compared with estimated expenditures of $4,700,000,000 this year and actual expenditures of $4,600,000,000 in 1950, $4,600,000,000 in 1948, and $1,400,000,000 in 1946.

4. The President requests $43,400,000,000 for defense including military, stockpile, NACA, Selective Service, merchant marine, Coast Guard, Alaska, Panama, and atomic energy. This figure is compared with an estimate of $22,600,000,000 for these items this year, $13,400,000,000 actual expenditures in 1950, $10,600,000,000 in 1948, and $45,400,000,000 in 1946.

5. The President requested $4,900,000,000 for veterans as compared with $5,700,000,000 estimated for this year, $6,600,000,000 in 1950, $6,600,000,000 in 1948, and $4,400,000,000 in 1946.

6. The President requested $5,900,000,000 for interest, claims, etc., as compared with an estimated $5,700,000,000 this year, and actual $5,800,000,000 in 1950, $5,200,000,000 in 1948, and $4,800,000,000 in 1946.

7. The budget includes all of the Fair Deal proposals; the Brannan plan, FEPC, $290,000,000 for federalized education in secondary schools, socialized housing, and socialized medicine, with its $275,000,000 in new taxes for this purpose.

8. The most constructive field of reduction was not only virtually untouched but in fact it was increased; namely, grants-in-aid to States. These grants to States were increased from an estimated $2,500,000,000 this year to $3,000,000,000 next year. In these perilous times when the Federal Government is forced to arm the Nation and has undertaken to prop up half the world economically and militarily, the least the States can do is to pay their own bills. I had hoped indeed that the President would come out for basic legislation declaring a moratorium on most of these payments, but there is no mention of such a proposal.

9. Civilian public-works requests in the 1952 budget total $3,400,000,000 as compared with $2,900,000,000 this year and $2,000,000,000 last year.

10. Despite expanded coverage of the social-security system, public-assistance grants would be increased. The whole social welfare, health, and security category would be increased by $105,000,000. Exclusive of the railroad retirement fund the increase in this category would total $57,000,000. Virtually none of it could be justified for the national defense.

11. The President includes at least $3,000,000,000 for civilian defense, including more than $1,000,000,000 for business loans, and a great many projects which are wide open for boondoggle exploitation by Federal agencies, State and local agencies, and fly-by-night business outfits, all of which are trying to get into the defense act.

12. The President says 40 percent of the items in the budget have been reduced but at the same time there are 304 increased items in the budget.

13. For the first time since the foreign-assistance programs were inaugurated, the defense and economic programs are consolidated in such a manner as to make it impossible to determine how much is proposed for each.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY AND NAVAL INSTALLATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 42)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on pp. 288–289.)

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, in relatively quiet periods those of us who are not members of the Foreign Relations Committee seldom speak on the floor of the Senate about foreign policy. At such times we are content to leave the discussion of these issues to those who in committee have pulled the laboring oar.

But when great storms arise and the helmsmen have to make crucial decisions about the future course of action, when the safety and peace of our country and of the world are at stake, then such matters become the proper concern of us all. It was probably such considerations as these which led the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to open the debate 10 days ago, and which has caused certain other Senators who are not members of the committee, including the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], to make their contributions. In the light of these precedents, I hope my colleagues will not think me forward if I rise to discuss the same set of concerns.

I. THE NEED FOR DECISION

Mr. President, along with others I am grateful to the eminent former President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, and to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] for raising the great issues of what should be America's commitments in the world and the precise military responsibilities which we should assume.

I should also like to compliment both Mr. Hoover and the Senator from Ohio, if I may, for speaking directly and clearly to the issues which they have raised and for their refusal to indulge in any personal attacks. The Senator from Ohio, it is true, made some rather stringent criticisms of the President of the United States and his past actions; but those criticisms were directed toward the President's exercise of his powers, rather than to the person of the Chief Executive.

We are further in debt to the Senator from Ohio for the fact that he chose to launch this debate in the proper forum of the United States Senate, rather than to make himself merely one of a series of prominent citizens relying upon the air waves as a medium for settling a great constitutional and political issue. By his determined forehandedness, he has set in train a Senate debate which in my judgment was both inevitable and proper. He has raised the issues which are at stake, in terms which should call forth a clear-cut decision by the Senate, and possibly by the House of Representatives.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER TO SEND TROOPS ABROAD

Mr. President, I believe that the President of the United States has the constitutional power to send additional troops to Europe; but I also believe that the issue as to whether it is wise for him to send them is so important that it is desirable and indeed necessary to debate it here in the United States Senate, and for us to reach fairly quickly a definite decision.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I prefer not to yield during the course of my main address, or at least not until I have finished with my attempted refutation of the position of the Senator from Ohio. I do this, not to shut off discussion, but merely in order that I may have a chance to develop my argument in some detail.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I did not rise to engage in debate, but merely because I seek information. I wondered whether the Senator meant that the President of the United States has the power under his implied powers as Chief Executive or as Commander in Chief, or whether the President has the powers under the United Nations Charter or under the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say to my good friend, the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado, that this will become manifest during the course of my remarks.

Let us start with the first point, namely, the constitutional powers of the President. A few days after American forces first went into action in Korea, I tried to review in the Senate the legislative history of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 with regard to the use of armed force. It is alleged—and I believe the Senator from Ohio so alleges—that since the Constitution in article I, section 8, gives solely to the Congress the power to declare war, the use of armed force by the President without congressional assent is consequently a violation of these powers, and hence a violation of the Constitution.

The true meaning of this provision, namely, to declare war, will be made much clearer, however, if we draw upon the notes which James Madison took of the debates of the Constitutional Convention, and if we trace the legislative history of the phrase, "to declare war." If we do this, we find that when the so-called Committee on Detail submitted its draft on August 6, 1787, it gave to Congress, not the right to declare, but, instead, the broader right to make war. Mr. Pinckney of South Carolina opened debate on this clause on August 17 by saying that he opposed vesting this power in the Legislature. "Its proceedings," he declared, "were too slow."

After further discussion by Mr. Butler of South Carolina, James Madison of Virginia and Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts both moved to strike out the verb "to make" and to substitute the verb "to declare." This was for the purpose, as Madison wrote in his Notes, of "leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks." The language we thus find in article I, section 8, was then accepted by a vote of seven States to two, with one State not participating, and three absent.

It is clear, then, that the Convention did not want to tie our country's hands by requiring congressional assent for all employment of armed force. It is obvious, instead, that, as Madison said, they wanted to leave to the President the power to use force to "repel sudden attacks," even though he was not specifically authorized to do so by Congress.

Even in later days, when the speed with which Congress could assemble constantly increased, Presidents continued to use our Armed Forces by executive direction against the forces and persons of other countries. Such action has indeed been taken on over a hundred occasions. Reference to those acts was made by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], in his address last week. Last July 5 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9648), I cited 15 important instances dating from 1798 to 1919, and including Jefferson's attack on the Barbary pirates, Polk's use of troops prior to the Mexican War, and Wilson's occupation of Vera Cruz. I shall not again burden the RECORD with them at this point.

Not only have Presidents exercised their constitutional powers as Commanders in Chief of the Nation's Armed Forces without specific declarations by Congress, but in the past they have specifically proclaimed their right to do so, and have recorded their assertions of this right. Thus, ex-President William Howard Taft, for example, wrote in his book, Our Chief Magistrate and His Power, as follows:

> The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the militia when called into the service of the United States. Under this, he can order the Army and the Navy anywhere he will, if the appropriations furnish the means of transportation * * * (p. 99).
> It is only in the case of a war of our aggression against a foreign country that the power of Congress must be affirmatively asserted to establish its legal existence (p. 95).

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, does the Senator mind yielding at this point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. There is considerable noise in the Chamber, and I wish to hear the Senator. Will he please read again the last sentence?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point made by the Senator from Colorado is well taken, and the Chair asks all Senators to maintain order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I repeat the quotation:

> It is only in the case of a war of our aggression against a foreign country that the power of Congress must be affirmatively asserted to establish its legal existence.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Would the Senator mind inserting, in the first quotation, and following the sentence:

Under this, he can order the Army and the Navy anywhere he will, if the appropriations furnish the means of transportation—

The following words:

Of course, the instrumentality which this power furnishes gives the President an opportunity to do things which involve consequences that it would be quite beyond his power under the Constitution directly to effect.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. TAFT. I think that should be added to the first quotation, because I think it is a substantial modification of it, and makes a substantial distinction between the right of the President to do something and his power as a fundamental consideration in this instance.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the distinguished Senator from Ohio will be patient, he will find that is a distinction which I shall make in a few minutes.

What I have quoted was the opinion of President Taft; and, while I do not want to start an internecine war within the Taft family, I am sure the Senator from Ohio joins with me and the Nation in the high opinion which we hold of William Howard Taft as a constitutional authority on the legal power of the President, for amongst many other claims to distinction he was certainly the only man in our history who was both President and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

In fact, we could not find a more precise distinction between the constitutional powers of the President and those of the Congress than President Taft's words:

If the appropriations furnish the means of transportation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I prefer not to yield for a question, because I am trying to develop my points step by step.

Mr. BREWSTER. I ask the Senator to yield for an interpolation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, I yield; provided I do not lose my right to the floor, and provided the interpolation is of reasonable length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Illinois may be interested to know that on a distinguished occasion the present Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine wrote an article in the Harvard Law Review, pronouncing William Howard Taft as utterly wrong on a great constitutional question, and ultimately the Supreme Court unanimously decided that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine were correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Both confession and assertion are good for the soul, but it so happens that this address by President Taft, which I have quoted, was delivered at Columbia University in 1915 or 1916, and, therefore, was subsequent to the learned opinion handed down by the learned Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine, when they were students at Harvard Law School.

The appropriations to dispatch additional troops to Europe are in the process of being asked of this session of the Congress. If the President, however, chose to dispatch those troops today, and had unobligated appropriations to the Military Establishment with which to carry out the job, he would have the constitutional right to do so.

The Senator from Ohio was at great pains in his address on this floor to assert that the vote by which the Senate in 1949 ratified the Atlantic Pact instrument did not give the President the legal authority to dispatch troops to France, and that only the technicality of our occupation status in Germany gave the President the right to send additional forces to that country. Without going into details of the argument, which seems to involve the question whether agreements under the North Atlantic Treaty are not subject to the requirements of section 6 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945, I will say that the Senator from Ohio can make out a strong case.

But the Senator is not correct, may I say, in believing that the President needed any authority from the Atlantic Pact instrument or the United Nations Act of 1945 to send troops to France, Germany, England, Korea, China, or, in the words of William Howard Taft, "anywhere he will." For that power was already given to him by the Constitution, which is prior to all the statute laws of the country.

QUESTION OF WHERE TROOPS ARE SENT SHOULD BE DEBATED

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I believe that the question as to where the United States is to send its forces and the terms under which they shall be sent, is so important, and that public opinion on the question is sufficiently divided to make it highly desirable to have that issue debated and decided on the floor of the United States Senate, and not merely discussed over the air by prominent citizens and officials in the executive branch. In particular we need to come to a decision on the principles of the Brussels agreement. The national interest, indeed, requires that a clear decision on the issue be reached by Congress in some express way. The constitutional powers of the Government are shared powers, and the issue is too important and the dangers to our survival too great, in my judgment, for the Executive to act without positive approval of Congress.

I am, of course, aware that the two positions which I have just been expressing run parallel and, on a strictly logical plane, do not meet. The President, in my view, could commit troops to Western Europe or elsewhere and then merely say to the Congress: "There you are; now to the Congress belongs the awesome responsibility of refusing to provide money and supplies to those American forces." That would be facing Congress with an accomplished fact. But I hope and believe that the President will not do that. The President said last Thursday that he would consult with congressional leaders before committing troops to Europe. But that is not enough, as I shall discuss at a later point in my remarks.

I am also fully aware of the fact that in the matter of sending troops to Europe or of not sending them, we are not starting from scratch. The composition of a joint defense force for the countries of the Atlantic Pact has been under discussion among the 11 nations for over a year. More than that, it was on last September 9 that the President of the United States declared that on the basis of recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, concurred in by the Secretaries of State and Defense, he had that day "approved substantial increases in the strength of the United States forces to be stationed in Western Europe in the interest of the defense of that area." I am not aware that any formal objection was made on the floor of the Senate to this proposal.

The agreement or understanding which was apparently concluded in Brussels in December was presumably in harmony with the President's prior statement. So the idea of our taking part in the collective defense of Europe is not novel.

But this program is being challenged more vigorously now than ever before. This has been partly caused by our defeat in Korea and by the consequent fear that if we go into Europe, we will get ourselves involved in another and more costly Korea. It has been partly caused by the well-justified feeling, which feeling I share, that the European countries have not been of great help to us or to the United Nations in repelling Communist aggression in Korea. We have apparently furnished about seven-eighths of the ground troops. But however caused, this feeling is real and we should face it.

If we can keep essential unity among ourselves and among the democratic peoples of the world, we can defeat Russian communism. In the interest of internal unity, I believe we should submit the Brussels Pact to debate and to decision and that we should not invoke the constitutional powers of the President as an excuse for the Senate not to deal with it. The constitutional argument which I have made thus far is directed to the fact that the President has acted within his constitutional powers and should not be criticized on this score for what he has done in Korea or at Brussels.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that, when he was not in the Chamber, I said that in the interest of developing a connected argument, I did not feel that I could yield for questions.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator merely allow the Senator from Michigan to make one remark?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I again stop briefly.

Mr. FERGUSON. It would be helpful if the Senator would state whether the Brussels agreement to which he refers is the one of December 1950.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator tell us the terms, in order that we may be able better to follow his argument?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall develop that as we go along, but I agree that, in the interest of national unity, we should now hold these powers in abeyance for a few weeks, and not send ground troops to Europe until we and the country reach a considered decision.

SECRETARY ACHESON'S PLEDGE REGARDING USE OF TROOPS UNDER THE ATLANTIC PACT

This, in my judgment, is all the more necessary in view of the virtual pledge which was given by Secretary Acheson on April 27, 1949, when the North Atlantic Pact was up for ratification. For in reply to the following question from Senator HICKENLOOPER, "Are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of those countries' capacity to resist?" Secretary Acheson replied, "The answer to that question, Senator, is a clear and absolute 'No'." (Hearings on the North Atlantic treaty, before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, 81st Cong., 1st sess., p. 47.)

Now I am quite ready to believe that Mr. Acheson gave this pledge in good faith, but that it later developed that the North Atlantic countries would not rearm adequately unless we gave them a pledge that our troops would fight beside them if they resisted and would actually be on hand if and when the trouble started. That is, they wanted to be protected at the time of the initial assault, and not merely rescued after they had been captured.

The aggressions of the Communist satellites in Korea also radically changed the picture. These developments, I believe, led to the Brussels agreement. But the Brussels agreement was negotiated under the North Atlantic treaty. It could not have been negotiated, had not the North Atlantic treaty been ratified. The Senate ratified that treaty after a categorical pledge had been given by the Secretary of State that it was not even expected that we would send a substantial number of troops to Western Europe prior to actual attack. Since that pledge was at least one of the considerations which led many Senators to vote for it, it would not be proper, in my judgment, for the administration now to try to put the agreement into effect by purely Executive action upon the narrow grounds of its constitutional powers. For to do so would violate the explicit pledge given by the Secretary to the Senate when we had the power of refusing to ratify the treaty under which the Brussels agreement was later negotiated. It would be the path of honor instead for the administration to submit the question of approving the Brussels agreement to at least the Senate and possibly the House, and for us on our side to act quickly and not to delay the matter by interminable additional hearings or by what is known outside the Senate as a filibuster.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator will yield that I might add, perhaps, somewhat to that point, in connection with the report of the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a short space of time.

Mr. TAFT. I am sorry I cannot enter into debate with the Senator, because I have to leave for New York in about 15 minutes, but I should like at this point, because it seems to me to be appropriate, to read what the Foreign Relations Committee said when it reported the North Atlantic Pact:

> The treaty in no way affects the basic division of authority between the President and the Congress as defined in the Constitution. In no way does it alter the constitutional relationship between them. In particular, it does not increase, decrease, or change the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces or impair the full authority of Congress to declare war.
> It has been questioned whether a treaty subordinating action to the constitutional processes of 12 democratic nations offers sufficient certainty and immediacy of action effectively to deter aggression. The committee is convinced that it does. The expression of the will of a whole people offers far more certainty than any commitment by a dictator. The action of the democracies in the past great war is concrete evidence of their ability to act with the necessary speed in the event of an emergency.

Of course, the impression given to the Senate was that the President could not execute the treaty without action by the Congress. If this is to be done, it should be done as the expression of the will of a whole people and not merely as a commitment by a dictator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I hope and believe that the administration will submit this question to the Congress soon, and I hope that the majority leadership will present such a resolution approving the Brussels agreement at an appropriate time. But I wish to serve notice that if this is not done by the leadership in the very near future, I will offer such a resolution myself. Then in good spirits let us accept the results and close our ranks against a common foe.

Perhaps there are detailed schedules and arrangements for troop disposition in the Brussels agreement which cannot be revealed for obvious security and tactical reasons. Then at least the general outline and principles of American troop participation which it calls for should, to the fullest extent that they can be divulged, be embodied in the resolution submitted to the Senate and the House.

There is one final note of caution, however, which I should add on these procedural questions. It is not only important that we decide, but also that we should decide quickly. If the Senate should get bogged down in long drawn out hearings and then in a filibuster, the need for action would justify the President using his constitutional powers and sending the first installment of troops overseas. In other words, since the safety of the country is at stake and since time is of the essence, if the Senate and Congress will not decide, then the President will have to act.

POSITIVE APPROVAL PREFERABLE TO THE NEGATIVE RESOLUTION

I may say that this is why I prefer a resolution drawn in an affirmative form, approving the Brussels agreement, to the resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] in a negative form, declaring that the President should not send troops overseas unless and until the consent of the Congress has been obtained. Under the resolution of the junior Senator from Nebraska, a vacuum in time would be created during which no troops could be moved overseas. No action could be taken until affirmative consent was given by the Congress that such troops could be sent.

That would mean that it would be possible for some groups in the Senate to filibuster to prolong the discussion, and possibly the whole question of security would be sidetracked. Therefore, I think the form which I suggest, namely, a resolution approving the sending of troops overseas, is much more in the national interest than would be a negative resolution of the type submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. For a brief question.

Mr. FERGUSON. Having left his script for the moment, I should like to ask him to explain to the Senate what the Brussels agreement is, and to what it commits us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not read it, and I doubt if any Senator has read it for I believe its actual text has not been released, but I have newspaper reports of some of its probable salient features which in due course of time will go into the RECORD.

WE NEED TO MAKE A BASIC POLICY DECISION

Mr. President, I, therefore, welcome this debate. I am confident that it will result in reaffirming the principle of collective security. But the debate, if we carry it out quickly and in good temper, will be a gain to the country. It will clear the air and the minds of all of us. It will remove any charge of bad faith that might be leveled at the administration because of Mr. Acheson's pledge. It will enable us to weigh the relative merits and dangers of the Brussels agreement and some of the other issues which are pressing for decision and then allow us to decide. Let us weigh the relative values of the different alternatives and decide. Then in good spirits I hope we may accept the results. Certainly I can pledge that if the decision goes against my particular point of view I will abide willingly and in good temper by the verdict of the majority.

II. THE BRUSSELS AGREEMENT AND THE THREE MAIN POINTS OF VIEW

Where then do we begin? We begin, Mr. President, with the fact that all responsible parties to the debate, both within and without the Congress, appear to be agreed on the basic ends which we seek, namely, to protect our country from Communist aggression. The differences are merely on means and methods, namely, when, at what points, how, and with whom we should prepare to defend ourselves. The fact that our ends are the same and that we disagree only on means should take all bitterness out of this debate and enable us to discuss the issues as friends and brothers.

It is true that there are still some who hold that the immediate danger of Communist aggression is highly speculative or nonexistent. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], for example, stated that it was not clear that the Russians contemplate a military conquest of the world.

I read from his remarks on page 65 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 5, 1951:

> In the first place, I believe they know it is impossible. It would take them at least a hundred years to get across the seas.

The Senator from Ohio apparently believes the Communists do not even contemplate military aggression with their own troops against Western Europe, but that they would move into West Germany with the Communist troops from East Germany, and possibly from Poland and Czechoslovakia as well.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. What I said was that there was, to my mind, no conclusive evidence of the fact that the Russians were going to attack. Further down I said there was a much greater possibility that they would, or something of that sort. I said I thought the chances were probably in favor of Russia not attacking, but certainly I did not venture to predict what they would do. I do not know what they will do. I think the chances are against attacking, but I certainly said that if there is a much greater possibility of its being done, we must take action against them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator had been willing to trust me a moment or two longer, he would have seen that I had a qualifying phrase about his views. I can assure him that I am trying to be completely fair.

I was going to say that the Senator from Ohio, despite these reservations, agrees with virtually all Americans, except Communists, fellow travelers, and honest pacifists, that—

> There is a greater possibility of a destructive war against our liberty than we have ever faced in the past.

So I did not mean to do the Senator wrong. If he had only waited for another sentence it would have been manifest that I was quoting his complete position.

The general debate which has arisen, therefore, is over the means and methods of averting such a war and of preparing to win it when and if it comes. If narrowed still further, the immediate question is whether we shall approve or disapprove the Brussels agreement.

There appear to be three main groups with conflicting views on these issues of the proper and wise means to use. The first group believes that we should not go through with our part of the Brussels agreement. The other two groups both believe that we should carry through with the Brussels agreement, but differ in regard to the degree of active interest which we should take in the affairs of Asia.

I think there will be no objection if I say that the first position is the Hoover position of protecting the United States and its outposts only.

1. THE TAFT-HOOVER POSITION: "PROTECT THE UNITED STATES AND OUTPOSTS ONLY"

First, there are those of the Taft-Hoover, or the "protect the United States and outposts only," school of thought who would confine our present efforts to the defense of America, but who would not use land armies importantly in that undertaking. I do not mean by this that there are not important differences in the views of the Senator from Ohio and those of former President Hoover. Mr. Hoover would apparently not take any real steps to defend the continents of either Asia or Europe, but would instead use island air bases, including Britain, primarily as a protective screen for the United States. The Senator from Ohio would use such bases, and many more of them than Mr. Hoover suggests, not only for this purpose but also for retaliatory and deterrent bombing over the continents of Asia and Europe themselves.

Both, however, see it as unwise and impractical to use American land forces on foreign soil to any appreciable extent, and certainly the general drift of their argument is against our committing more American ground troops upon either the continent of Europe or Asia. This group will, therefore, be opposed—unless they are convinced by the logic of this debate—to our furnishing 8 or 10 divisions for the defense of continental Europe as is reported to have been provided under the Brussels agreement.

2. THE "PROTECT EUROPE BUT NOT ASIA" POSITION

The second group, representing the "protect Europe but not Asia" position, believes that we should join in the defense of Western Europe and carry out the Brussels agreement. But this is about as far as they would go. They would slight any defense of Asia and would tend to confine our efforts to the defense of Western Europe. For Western Europe, it is said, is the vital seat of power and the only permanent head for the Russia serpent, which has its coils in so many satellite states of Europe and Asia.

These same persons would restrict our binding military commitments in the Pacific area to those outposts of our sea approaches—Japan, Okinawa, the other Ryukyus, Formosa, the Philippines, the small islands of the Pacific, New Zealand, and the subcontinent of Australia.

This group is supported by many in the councils of the executive government and by a number of able publicists. These men hold the view, of which the British are the strongest exponents, that the Communist timetable is geared for the next 3 years to picking up soft spots—and, incidentally, raw materials—in Asia, thus affording a considerable amount of time in which the west may vastly improve Europe's defenses. This school of thought sincerely believes that anything which diverts America's interests from the vital European theater merely serves the interests of Russian aggression. The advocates of this point of view are, therefore, more or less willing to let the continent of Asia go. They are resigned to this because they believe that we and Western Europe do not have the strength to defend both Asia and Western Europe and that if we are to protect the latter, we must abandon the former.

BRITAIN SEEMS TO AGREE WITH HOOVER'S POLICY

While this comparison may shock our British friends, it is nevertheless true that their reluctance to back us up in the Far East is very similar to Mr. Hoover's reluctance to back them up in Europe. The British are at present, therefore, largely isolationist in their attitudes toward the Far East. They apparently do not want to use any more of their strength to help defend the principle of collective security in areas such as Korea and China where their own national and material interests are not directly involved, although they probably would feel very differently were Malaya, Singapore, and India to be directly and immediately threatened. While I want to make it clear that I shall try to keep the term "isolationist" out of this debate in my remarks, if the British regard Mr. Hoover and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] as isolationists, so far as Europe is concerned, they should not object if others regard them as isolationists in the matter of Asia, or at least the Far East.

This isolationism is the most charitable explanation of why the British early recognized the Chinese Communists; why, after the open and barefaced aggression by these Chinese Communists, they are still opposed to having the United Nations brand them as such; why they are opposed to having the United Nations or ourselves invoke economic sanctions against the Chinese Communists; and why they want the Chinese Communists seated in the United Nations itself. The British attitude is probably stiffened by the large profits which their traders are making from handling the huge volume of trade with Communist China through Hong Kong.

According to a report from Hong Kong which appeared in the New York Times January 3, section C, page 52, Hong Kong in the first 11 months of this year had 35 percent more trade than it had during the preceding 12 months. It had $1,150,000,000—American money—of trade. On a monthly rate this was 42 percent above the preceding year. And yet 1949 had previously been the year of greatest trade in the history of the port. In other words, the traders of Hong Kong have been making enormous profits out of supplying the Chinese Communists, and they are therefore strengthening the Chinese forces which are shooting down our troops and, indeed, British troops in Korea. I hope the British people will wake up to what is happening for I do not think they will approve of it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a question, on my promise that I shall not take more than a minute? I think it is timely to ask the question at this point in his address.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be glad to yield for an interjection.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does not the Senator from Illinois, who is making a very able address—and I wish the full membership of the Senate could be present to hear it—agree that the policy of doing business with Communist China is on a par with what was done by businessmen, both British and American, who were shipping scrap iron and oil to the Japanese war lords prior to Pearl Harbor, and that commercial dealings with blood money in support of a potential aggressor may have the same disastrous effects upon the peace and the security of the world which resulted from the dealings with the Japanese war lords in scrap iron and oil prior to December 7, 1941?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from California for his observation. I agree with him. I hold in my hand a clipping from the New York Times of December 16. According to this dispatch written by Henry R. Lieberman from Hong Kong and appearing on page C 3, the British merchants in Hong Kong are opposing the United States ban on exports to Red China and to Hong Kong, saying it is a vicious blockade. The British colony in Hong Kong, at least, wants to continue this obviously profitable trade, even though at the time this dispatch was written the Chinese Communist armies were in the field attacking our men and others in the UN forces. I want to make clear, however, that this is not the sole reason for British action. It is merely one strand but a powerful one. British diplomats, elements of left-wing labor and the Hong Kong traders with their influence in the city of London are all at work to favor Red China. The British view of military strategy is, therefore, intensified by their short-run economic interests, although the same is not true of those Americans who follow the same line. They have no such economic interest.

3. THE "PROTECT FREEDOM EVERYWHERE WE CAN" POSITION

Third. There is finally a third school, to which I belong, which believes that the United States must strive to help put down aggression everywhere; provided, however, first, that other nations will adequately join us in the attempt; and second, that the places in which the aggression occurs, or threatens to occur, are accessible to our forces. I would call this the "Protect Freedom Everywhere We Can" position. It would be impracticable and unwise, for example, for us to try to resist Communist aggression in Tibet. But if joined by other nations in an equality of sacrifice, we believe that it is vital to resist Communist aggression not only in Western Europe, but also in Indochina, in Malaya, in Indonesia, in North Africa, in the Near East—yes, in India too.

We favor this because we believe that peace is indivisible, and because we believe that if aggression, particularly of the concerted Communist type, is allowed to succeed, it will build up the strength of the aggressors and encourage them to further aggression. We believe that it is better to check aggression in its early stages before it has gathered great headway, rather than merely deal with it later when, in full armor and swollen strength, it attacks us where the material and territorial interests necessary for our security are directly at stake.

We do not believe in this policy in order to be aggressive ourselves, nor from any desire to throw our weight around. We believe in it because we want the reign of law to triumph and want all men and nations to be able to live relatively free from the fear of attack, and hence be able to enjoy freedom and justice and to cultivate the arts of peace. We would like to have the United States, as the strongest Nation in the world, continue to take the lead in these efforts, although we have no desire to dictate to anyone, even in these worthwhile pursuits. For we believe that the ultimate safety of the United States lies in having a secure world and that our own safety, like that of other nations, is involved in the maintenance of peace everywhere.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will yield for an interjection, but not for a question.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Will the Senator repeat the conditions which he attaches?

Mr. DOUGLAS. First, that other nations will adequately join us in our attempts to stop aggression. Second, that the places in which the aggression occurs, or threatens to occur, are accessible to our forces.

In the much-quoted words of John Donne, we believe that—

> No man is an island unto himself. Every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main.

Mr. President, let us consider the substance of these views. I hope I shall be able to state fairly the arguments for each and to pass a balanced judgment upon them. In all this discussion, we should remember that while the approval of the Brussels agreement or understanding is in the immediate foreground; in the background lies the question of our whole foreign policy and the proper programs for our military and economic defense.

III. THE TAFT-HOOVER PROGRAM OF "PROTECT THE UNITED STATES AND OUTPOSTS ONLY"

I shall try to state the so-called Taft-Hoover program to protect the United States and outposts only, and I shall try to state it as clearly and as strongly as I can.

The Taft-Hoover program, as I see it, rests upon the following four pillars as arguments. I may say that I merely wish to state their contentions. I do not agree with them. Nevertheless, I believe they should be stated concisely and vigorously.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, before the Senator goes into the discussion, will he yield for a question, not for the purpose of debate, but for the purpose of developing information?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; provided it is not too long.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I notice numerous references to the Brussels agreement. I also believe I heard the Senator say that we do not have the Brussels agreement before us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to have the Senator's opinion as to what is in the Brussels agreement, and the relation of General Eisenhower's visit to the Brussels agreement. I do not see how we can relate these things if we do not know what they mean.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not wish to tantalize the very able Senator from Colorado excessively on this point. I may say that I shall come to that question later. We have all read the newspapers. We all have a rough idea of what is probably in the Brussels agreement. When I come to discuss the military situation I shall make explicit what the newspapers have to say, so far as the probable total number of divisions is concerned, and so far as target dates and American participation are concerned.

Mr. MILLIKIN. May I ask the distinguished Senator whether he knows whether either our Committee on Armed Services or our Committee on Foreign Relations has been advised of the contents of the Brussels agreement?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not a member of either of those committees. Therefore, of course, I do not know. But we all read the newspapers, and we have probably a fairly accurate idea of what that agreement is. Furthermore, we are all very certain that the Brussels agreement will provide for our furnishing further troops to the joint defense of Europe. While we may not know the precise number of troops called for, the principle of sending more troops is the real issue at stake.

Mr. President, let me state the four arguments, as I see them, behind the Taft-Hoover program.

First. The first argument runs to this effect: The countries of Western Europe, they say, will not cooperate fully or adequately in building a joint army capable of holding a military line against the Russians. The assumption here seem to be that Europe is so war-weary and so undermined by Communist strength and propaganda that it will not have the resolution to arm itself adequately or to resist. Even with the addition of 10 divisions or even 1,500,000 American troops, the total European forces, according to the Senator from Ohio, would not be enough to check the huge and well-organized Communist armies coming from the east. To commit any appreciable number of American troops to the continent would, therefore, according to him, and to others, be to invite their virtually certain destruction. It is implied that our troops would be either annihilated or captured, while less temperate exponents of this point of view have said that the very blood of those American boys would be upon the hands of those who sent them overseas.

Second. The second argument, as I see it, is that according to the Senator from Ohio, in order to fulfill our admitted commitments under the North Atlantic Pact and the military-aid program, however mistaken such agreements originally were, we should concentrate our support in the form of sea and air power. Without risking any appreciable number of ground troops, we should furnish a well-equipped air force to bomb the advancing Communist armies in the event war is declared. Then if the Communists took Western Europe by force, our airplanes could be used to destroy the steel and iron plants and in fact the whole industrial potential of that area, as well as targets in Russia.

Third. The third argument seems to be that the sending of additional American troops to Europe might provoke a Russian attack and hence hasten rather than delay war. "We should not," Mr. TAFT says, "be a military aggressor or give the impression of military aggression or incite a war which might otherwise never occur"—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 5, 1951, page 61. The Senator from Ohio says that he does "not believe we shall be so welcome in Europe tomorrow, if war ever occurs"—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 5, 1951, page 64—and that we would be less popular there if we were the "main instigators" of war, presumably by drawing a defense line in Western Europe and thus provoking Russia to attack.

Fourth. The fourth argument is that the giving military aid to Western Europe, including the use of ground troops, would involve us in such terrific expense that, according to the Senator from Ohio, there would be a yearly deficit of at least $20,000,000,000. This would mean inflation, the imposition of controls and an inevitable loss of what the Senator, calls "liberty at home." The Senator from Ohio believes his own program could be carried through with 3,000,000 men under arms, with a military budget of forty billions and a total budget of sixty-five billions. This sum, he believes, is about the most which can be raised by taxation and hence the most that can be spent without inflation and all its terrible results.

IV. A REFUTATION OF THE TAFT-HOOVER "PROTECT THE UNITED STATES AND OUTPOSTS ONLY" POSITION

I want to consider the relative soundness of these four main pillars upon which the conclusions of Messrs. TAFT and Hoover so largely rest and which have led them and their followers to regret the further commitments of troops contained in the Brussels agreement or understanding. I shall consider each of these objections in order and then I shall show some of the positive advantages of the Brussels agreement.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a point of information with reference to the Brussels agreement and its commitments? Would I be correct in assuming that the Senator is speaking of the Brussels agreement as synonymous in terms with the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. I have been waiting to develop this point, but inasmuch as the same question arises over and over, I may say that I have before me a number of copies of the New York Times, including the issues of Wednesday, January 3, and Sunday, December 24 and so on. The statement of reputable correspondents on several occasions is that it is believed that the Brussels agreement calls for a total strength in Western Europe of approximately 55 divisions; that it is probable that the American contribution is to be 10 divisions—possibly 8, but probably 10—and that the target date at which this maximum strength is to be reached, which was originally 1953, may possibly have been shoved forward to the end of 1952.

The Brussels agreement has not been given to the public. I do not know what its precise contents are. I have no inside sources of information, all I know is what I read in the newspapers. I do not know whether any Member of the Senate knows more. But we do know that the correspondents of one of the most reliable newspapers in the United States, competent correspondents, have stated that these are the general terms. I have never heard a denial from the State Department that these are not the terms.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a point of information?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am assuming that the statements which we have seen in the press represent approximately the facts, although, so far as I am concerned the real issue is not so much how many troops shall we send, but shall we send further troops.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have again and again stated that in order to preserve continuity in my remarks I did not wish to yield for extended questioning.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, let me aid the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I should like to say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that the Senator from New Jersey, at a hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee, asked the very question which is raised here. I asked what, if anything, were the agreements at Brussels. I was told that there were no fixed agreements, but that whatever there was was top secret, and that even the Senator from New Jersey, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, could not get any information whatever on the subject. I think my colleagues on that committee will bear out that statement. We were told that no comment of any kind should be made because of the danger of leakage to the press.

I am very much concerned about the statement that there is some agreement, because certainly the Foreign Relations Committee should know about it if it exists.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I read from the New York Times of Wednesday, January 3. If it is in the New York Times, I take it that it is available to everyone, and cannot be classified as secret. Does the Senator from New Jersey agree with me in that statement?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. All the Senator from New Jersey can say is that if the New York Times has this information and members of the Foreign Relations Committee cannot get it because it is top secret that is something that we ought to know about. It is a very important disclosure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know how the New York Times got this information. I merely say that to the best of my knowledge it is a responsible newspaper.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I merely say, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, that we were told that it was such a top secret that we could not even be trusted with it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I take it the Senator from New Jersey reads the New York Times. I wonder if he noticed the article in the issue of Wednesday, January 3, section C, on page 47——

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would it be regarded as top secret if I were to place it in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I certainly think not. I am interested in what the New York Times got that members of the Foreign Relations Committee could not get.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me ask the chairman of the Armed Services Committee [Mr. RUSSELL] if I would be violating any rules of security if I were to place in the RECORD a quotation from the New York Times on the nature of the Brussels agreement.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that this is merely an individual opinion. I am not undertaking to express the opinion of the Armed Services Committee, because we have had no meeting on this subject. However, it would not be a violation of any security regulation of which I have any knowledge to place any newspaper article in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Georgia. With the reassurance that I shall neither be subject to court martial as a Reserve officer nor expelled from membership in the United States Senate, I should like to place this passage in the RECORD.

Mr. LEHMAN rose.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from New York allow me a little time?

At the moment of his arrival General Eisenhower's total force probably will not number more than eight effective divisions; two United States, two British with a third due soon, three French plus one Belgian. With this General Eisenhower must face for at least a year an estimated 175 combat Russian divisions. However, by the end of 1952—if the Atlantic alliance powers translate their paper plans into armed troops—General Eisenhower should be able to count on upwards of 55 Allied divisions in Europe—with 20 more pledged for the year following.

This is from a rather extended article analyzing and summarizing the results of the Brussels Conference by Benjamin Welles of the Times staff. And there have been other similar references.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Am I to understand that the Senator from Illinois now proposes that the Brussels agreement be submitted to the entire Senate in all its details, and that until it is ratified by the Senate it would not become effective?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, no. I am proposing that it be submitted in its main outlines and principles to the Senate; that the general gist be submitted for discussion and approval, but that in the meantime it shall be operative. I am agreeing that the President has the constitutional power to act, and that no constitutional vacuum, so to speak, exists.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, may I ask one other question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. LEHMAN. Simply to clarify my own thinking. It is not quite clear to me how, if an agreement is submitted to the Senate for its consideration and ratification——

Mr. DOUGLAS. "Approval," I think, is a better word than "ratification."

Mr. LEHMAN. "Approval." I should have used that term. It is not clear to me how the President can then proceed to operate under the agreement, if, on the one hand, he submits an agreement to the Senate for its approval and then by action of a small body of men——

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senate of the United States.

Mr. LEHMAN. It is rejected. I do not see how the President can then proceed without virtually defying and flouting the Congress of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is quite true. If it is submitted to the Senate, and the Senate votes it down, while the President could still have the constitutional power to act, I do not think he would have the moral right to act unless subsequent developments made it absolutely imperative.

Mr. LEHMAN. What would happen if the Senate took no action whatsoever; if there was a filibuster?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senate did not act, then the President would have the moral, as well as the constitutional, right to act. In other words, it is important that there should be a right to act, and if the Senate does not take advantage of its opportunity and decide, then the President should decide and act as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I listen to the siren from Colorado. He is a very attractive siren. I know unless I stuff wax in my ears or lash myself to the mast he is likely to lead me onto the rocks. However, I shall take that chance and yield for a slight observation, but not for a question.

Mr. MILLIKIN. So that we may get rid of the confusion of the nondisclosed Brussels agreement, I wonder whether we may assume that when the distinguished Senator contrasts these various views which have been offered, he himself is speaking in terms of sending ground troops over, say of the order of 8 or 10 divisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That will clarify the debate completely so far as getting the Senator's viewpoint of these various proposals is concerned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; and on the other hand the essence of the Taft-Hoover proposal is that we should not send further ground troops.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator is explaining the essence of various proposals by others. I want to know what the Senator is proposing.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for an observation, not for a question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I desire to clarify one point about the agreement. I have not read all the article from the New York Times. I do not think it is quite right to leave the impression, which is left, unless there is something else in the article that says there was a formal agreement at Brussels. I believe that article—the one which I read—leaves the impression that there were no more than tentative discussions as to plans; that there was no agreement. From what little discussion I have heard that is, I believe, a more accurate way to describe it than to leave the impression that there was a formal agreement arrived at in Brussels. My own view is that I think there were only discussions as to perhaps the proper way to proceed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is pretty hard to determine when flesh and tissue turn into cartilage, and cartilage into bone, and so on, and so on. The degrees of solidification are difficult to map out. But I read again from the New York Times, this time from the issue of Sunday, December 24, and for the benefit of the Senator from Michigan and others I will say it is in section 4 E, page 1, the second column, near the bottom:

> The contemplated Atlantic army would by no means equal Russia's—

And notice this—

In addition, it may be worth while to note that in the Atlantic Council's communique from Brussels on December 19, which appears in the New York Times for December 20, on page C 11, the following is stated:

> The North Atlantic Council, acting on the recommendations of its defense committee, today completed arrangements initiated in September last for the establishment in Europe of an integrated force under a centralized control and command. This force is to be composed of contingents contributed by the participating governments.

And 3 days later the report of the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, as reported on page C 3 of the Times for December 23, included the following:

> The important thing now in the future is action. At Brussels we did several things. We took recommendations which had come from the meetings immediately preceding in London and acted on those recommendations. They had to do with the creation of the united, unified, integrated army which is to provide for the defense of Europe.
> The papers which came to us laid out the structure of that army, how it should be composed, of what troops, where should the troops come from, how should it be organized, what was its command structure which would give that army its direction, and how should the supreme commander be selected and appointed. All of those matters were dealt with in the papers that came to us, and all of those matters were acted upon.
> The structure was agreed upon and the force was created.

From all of these reports it seems reasonable to conclude that agreements of substance were concluded.

1. WILL WESTERN EUROPE COOPERATE?

Now to return to the refutation of the Taft-Hoover contentions, the first pillar in the Taft-Hoover argument is their insistence that the morale of western Europe is so bad and its military strength so weak that it is foolhardy to endanger the lives of American troops by putting them beside the Europeans.

One strand in this argument is the widely held assumption that England, France, and the other European nations are shirking the job of rearmament. It is this belief, namely, that France and other European nations are shirking the job of rearmament, which lies behind the contention that, if we help western Europe with ground forces to the degree which we apparently promised at Brussels, we will be bearing far too much of the load. It was this feeling which apparently prompted Mr. Hoover to say that "before we land another man or another dollar on their shores" the European nations must supply "organized and equipped combat divisions in such huge numbers as would erect a sure dam against the Red flood."

A. DO WE HAVE AN EQUALITY OF SACRIFICE?

What then is the truth behind these assumptions which the advocates of the Taft-Hoover policy make hourly that Europe is not doing its share to protect itself?

Somewhat to my own surprise, I must confess, I find that even before the increases reported to have been decided upon at Brussels are added, the defense efforts of the western European nations are largely comparable to our own. Anyone who will look into the facts, Mr.

President, will discover that the picture that has been painted of our promising aid to people who will not help themselves is not an accurate picture at all.

What has helped to create the mistaken impression has been the superficial comparison of the total number of men we in the United States have under arms with the total number which a given European country such as France, Britain, or Holland has in its armed forces, and the absolute amounts which we spend for armaments compared with the total sums being expended by a given government. When, for example, it is found that we have more than three times as many in our Armed Forces as France and are spending 10 times as much on armament as Great Britain, the average person almost immediately forms the conclusion that these countries are lying down on the job. But what this snap judgment ignores is the fact that our population is more than three times as great as that of France—almost four times—while our national income is approximately six times that of the United Kingdom.

To use absolute figures to determine the relative degree of sacrifice as between countries is, therefore, absolutely fallacious. For we would not expect a middle-sized man to bear the same load as a giant or a poor man to contribute as much to the armed services as a millionaire. We, therefore, should use the relative degree of sacrifice rather than the absolute amount of sacrifice to find out how the various countries in the North Atlantic alliance compare with each other. In other words, we should not compare the total number of men under arms in the various countries, but the number per 1,000 population, or better still, if the figures were available, the number per 1,000 males between the ages of 18 and 45. And similarly we should not compare the total amounts spent for military purposes, but instead the percentages which these military expenditures form of the national income in the various countries.

But up to now, it has not been possible to find such comparisons as these upon which, in a sense, a large part of the argument actually turns.

I, therefore, have been trying for a considerable period of time to get the facts on these all important questions and have studied official publications and all other available sources. As a result, I think I am now able to present for the first time a series of these comparisons which should go a long way toward settling the question.

LET US COMPARE OUR EFFORTS WITH THOSE OF WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. President, at this point, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks table I comparing for this year and the year just ended the number of men in the Armed Forces per 1,000 population in the United States and the principal western European countries. I have put the same figures on the chart on the easel at the side of the room.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[11] Estimated. The actual number would probably be between 300,000 and 400,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that if any Senators wish to follow the argument in detail, I can have copies of the tables, and indeed, of my whole speech furnished to any Senators so they can follow the figures.

NUMBER OF MEN IN ARMED SERVICES PER 1,000 POPULATION

Table I, Mr. President, shows that the number of men per 1,000 of population in the Armed Forces of the United States for 1950 was 14 per thousand; for the United Kingdom, 16; for France, 16; for Italy, which has treaty restrictions on its forces, that is, a ceiling fixed by treaty, 6.5; and then I have pieced together the best estimates I can obtain in regard to Norway, Denmark, Luxemburg, Portugal, Holland, and Belgium, and I have lumped them together. I believe they have in their armed forces somewhere between 300,000 and 400,000, in total, and I have given the figure 350,000 as the most probable one. So for the Atlantic Pact countries in Scandinavia, the Low Countries, and Portugal, the figure is approximately 10 men in the armed services per 1,000 population.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Has the Senator included in the calculation the number in the Reserves?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, I have not; I have included only the actual number in the field.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Illinois has not taken into consideration the universal military training program in those countries, has he?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not; that is correct; nor have I included in the calculation the number of men who have now passed out of the active armed forces in those countries.

So, Mr. President, we see that England and France had in their armed forces a larger number of men per thousand of population than the United States had, based on a total number of approximately 2,750,000.

Comparing anticipated strengths as of some date in the first half of 1951, Mr. President, we find, for the United States, 18 men per thousand in the armed forces; for the United Kingdom, 18; and for France, 18. Therefore it will be seen that this is a precise equality. Italy's figures remain restricted under treaty, and I do not have comparable 1951 figures for the smaller Atlantic Pact nations.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe that in yesterday's Washington Star, if I am not mistaken, in the editorial section there was a special report, published by one of its contributing editors or one of its staff members, setting forth what the new developments were in the defense strength of the North Atlantic countries. I wonder whether the Senator from Illinois will include that report.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, I have pieced out some material, and in a few moments I shall include it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In view of the fact, Mr. President, that I strongly criticized the small degree of sacrifice which other members of the United Nations, particularly Great Britain, have made so far as the war in Korea is concerned, it is only simple justice, and I am very happy to do so, to assert, that the principal Western European nations have, up to this time, gone step by step with us in at least mobilizing their total forces against the common danger. I think the figures I have cited are of enormous significance for this debate—perhaps more significant than my own remarks about the feasibility of committing United States troops to the defense of Europe, for our troops, Mr. President, will not carry a major share of the burden that must be borne.

Following out the query of the Senator from Minnesota, let me say, Mr. President, that the first table I have presented does not include figures on the strength of the organized reserves in the various countries. If these are included, France, with its compulsory military service and its approximately 1.5 million in reserve divisions, makes a still better showing, for its ratio of organized military strength is then approximately 50 per 1,000 population, as compared to our 20 per 1,000. On this basis, the French are doing twice as much as we are. It should not be forgotten that they and the British have had universal military training—not merely selective service—for some years, whereas we have not yet adopted it.

I think I should say that the French reserves are organized into divisions. It is not certain how fully equipped these are, and there may have been some slackening in combat efficiency. So I do not wish to overstretch the reserve strength which lies in the million and one-half French reserve troops; but they are there, and in some degree they are ready to take the field.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Inasmuch as I have been declining to yield to other Senators for questions, I yield to the Senator from Minnesota only for an observation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to make the observation that recent evidence indicates that most of the North Atlantic Pact countries are extending the period of their compulsory service and universal military training.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I shall make that point in a moment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall read ahead, then, in the Senator's prepared remarks.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota is always so alert that the point he makes is one which in simple logic should follow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes he should announce that the Chair has no . .ht to recognize a Senator who is yielded to by another Senator, in order to permit the making of an observation only, unless unanimous consent for that purpose is given; and from this time forth the Chair will insist that unanimous consent must be obtained before a Senator may yield to another Senator to make an observation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question which will help the consecutiveness of his argument?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Provided it does not take too long, and provided it does not lead me too far astray, and provided further, that it does not establish a precedent in regard to future yieldings.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator how many divisions France has uncommitted and how many divisions the United Kingdom has uncommitted—divisions which would be available for action in Western Europe at the present time if there were need for action?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know; but I read from the January 3 edition of the New York Times in which it was stated that at the moment of his arrival, General Eisenhower's total forces probably will not number more than eight effective divisions: two United States; two British, with a third due soon; three French; plus one Belgian.

Now let me continue with my presentation. Would the Senator from Colorado think me impolite if I were to ask to be permitted to continue, in order to develop the full force of my argument?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I would never consider the Senator from Illinois impolite.

In speaking of the contributions of France and of the United Kingdom, which have been mentioned by the senior Senator from Illinois, and in connection with which he read from the New York Times, let me ask a question: Both of these nations are committed to actions against communism at the present time, are they not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The divisions which I mentioned are on the continent of Europe, and therefore those forces will be available.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I mean that of the armies committed, France has strength in Indochina, and it is committed; and the United Kingdom has committed divisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The United Kingdom has committed two divisions in Malaya, I believe.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The United Kingdom has stationed divisions at other places in the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Colorado adds further strength to my argument that France and England are now, although not in the same degree, participating in this world-wide struggle. But the divisions they are to furnish in Europe are in addition to those now in service in other areas.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator from Illinois makes the mistake of thinking that I am trying to weaken his argument. However, that is not the case.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I am delighted, for the Senator from Colorado is a very formidable antagonist; and now that I know he is in my camp, my spirits bound up. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from Illinois does not completely obscure his argument by strict insistence upon consecutiveness, he may find an ally in his camp.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am trying to develop that these charts do not reach the end point of what is available for action in Western Europe if there is need.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; but the chart shows the relative contributions of the various countries. As a matter of fact, if and when we commit 10 divisions or so to Western Europe, that will not be all we have. We will have some more in Asia and Japan and some more at home.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think that is very interesting, but not decisive.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that last year the French had in their army more men per thousand of population than we had in ours, I could, indeed, pardon an ex-President of France—although I would not agree with him—if he were to go on the airways to proclaim that France would not contribute another man or another franc until America had matched them with an equality of service. I hasten to say that I hope no ex-President of France would do so, for I do not think it would be correct for such a statement to be made. However, I could understand it if an ex-President of France were to make such a statement, and it might be just as sound for him to do so as for another ex-President to say that not another man or another dollar should be contributed on our part until France had matched us.

Mr. MILLIKIN. To go into the matter of statements by ex-Presidents is dangerous.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This ex-President of France is nameless; he could be one of a number.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to throw a little light on the question I raised a moment ago, before we pass beyond that point?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In the New York Times of January 5, I have noted a question put to General Eisenhower, as follows:

> Question. At the last meeting of the North Atlantic Defense Ministers they announced that they had reached an agreement on what each nation should contribute in types and numbers.

This is the answer by General Eisenhower:

> Answer. I simply shall have to plead ignorance. I am not dodging the question. I know nothing about it, and I don't see how—until someone in a relative position of authority can dig into it—how it could be fixed beyond peradventure of change.

I think General Eisenhower certainly must have known if there had been an actual agreement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The principle was established. There were undoubtedly some understandings, and with the high record for accuracy of the New York Times, I believe that it is not too far from the truth. If General Eisenhower stated that final agreements on details were not reached, I am confident that also is true.

Let us remember also that under the Brussels plan, according to reports, the French, British, and all the smaller countries have pledged themselves materially to increase their armed forces. The proportions for all countries are going to rise, but I have not been able to obtain the figures. The Senator from Arkansas says the proportions have not yet been agreed upon, but I am confident they will show a substantial equality of sacrifice on the part of the other members of the pact. I hope that the terms of the Brussels agreement will provide for a substantial increase in the relative contributions which the smaller countries, such as Belgium, Holland, Canada, and other nations, will make to the common defense. All too frequently there is a tendency on the part of the small countries to take a free ride upon the strength of the large countries and to depend for their protection upon the strength of the large nations, but since this is a common battle, they should make their own contributions as well, and these should approach an equality with the three big powers. Belgium and Holland, for example, should rise nearer to the level of France.

OTHER FACTORS INDICATING WESTERN EUROPE IS INCREASING HER STRENGTH

I now come to a further point, namely, what is in the works for these other countries. I have gone over the foreign press and periodicals, and have pieced together what I think is happening in the other nations.

The Belgian Parliament, for example, is considering an increase in military service from 12 to 24 months. There should be an increase of about 50 percent in military forces by the end of 1951. The military budget is being substantially increased.

Luxemburg, a country large enough to have an ambassador from us—or is she but a minister—is considering increases in both military forces and defense budget.

Denmark has increased its military budget more than 50 percent and is planning a sizable increase in armed forces by the end of next year. It is considering increasing military service from 12 to 18 months.

France is undertaking a rapid build-up of forces, despite the heavy drain caused by operations in Indochina.

This I think is not classified, but I believe is in the newspapers. They have announced a new 20-division program, of which 5 will be created and equipped in 1951. The period of military service has been increased from 12 to 18 months.

The Italian forces are limited to the present level by the peace treaty. Italy is improving the quality of her troops and undertaking large military production. That country now conscripts for 12 months and is planning an increase to 15 months.

The Dutch picture is complicated by the planned reduction after the Indonesian war ended. Both military forces and the defense budget were reduced then and have not yet been substantially increased. However, they are raising, according to my understanding, another division next year. Military service is now 12 months, and they are considering an increase to 18 months.

The Norwegians are undertaking an immediate increase in forces and conscript for 10 to 12 months. So far they have not announced an increased budget or increased the period of military service, but are considering an increase in military service to 18 months.

The United Kingdom has announced an increased strength next year of about 100,000. It is my impression, though I may not be able to verify it, that they have since said that their strength would go up by 200,000. In fact the wire services today carry a story of substantial British increases reported to General Eisenhower. She has increased military service from 18 to 24 months and has urged other Atlantic Pact countries to do likewise. She is also undertaking a very large production program which should provide the bulk of equipment for her own forces.

All this bears out the statement on this point which the President made in his state of the Union speech on last Monday.

Mr. President, I am not contending that all the other countries are doing everything they should; I am not contending that any of them is doing everything it should. I do not think we are doing all we should. I merely say that on a comparative basis the European countries are marching along with us, and that they cannot be disregarded, and cannot be said to be shirking their duty. That is all I say on this point, Mr. President.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield, provided I do not establish a dangerous precedent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe my question will be very germane. Was not the military preparedness of some of the North Atlantic Pact countries diminished or weakened by reason of the fact that many of them came out of World War II practically destroyed, immobilized, after having been under the occupation of German armies?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not also a fact that they had no equipment or manpower organized into divisional strength, or military power?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota is correct. The European countries, including France and England, as well as Italy, bore the direct burden of the war. As we all know, they have been in an extremely bad condition, with plants destroyed, people starving, and industry in difficulties. They are building up slowly. They are getting on their feet now, but, in view of the burdens they have sustained and the losses they have suffered, I do not think we should condemn them, particularly in view of the efforts which they have made.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that most of these countries, such as Belgium, Holland, Norway, Denmark, Luxemburg, and even France, were without military forces even as late as 1946, in terms of a real, organized strength?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. Their strength was broken through the war, and they did not have a wartime basis of strength upon which to build in peacetime. They had to start to build up their armies again from scratch.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not true that one of the requirements of the Marshall plan of economic assistance was that the Marshall-plan funds were to be used for domestic economic peacetime development, not for the military potential?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct. We were hoping that the world would be at peace, and our purpose was to build up Europe so that the countries might enjoy the fruits of increased production, and not have it siphoned off into war.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me at that point, I should like to say that I saw an article recently——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for a brief observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may yield only for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield for a brief observation, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I merely wished to say that I read in the press recently certain itemized statements regarding refunds we had required from certain European countries, when some of the materials had been diverted to military purposes. The theory was that it was partly by way of propaganda and partly for other reasons that we were extending Marshall-plan aid for the purpose of building up the strength of those countries.

PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT DEVOTED TO DEFENSE

Mr. DOUGLAS. Again, Mr. President, if we look at the question of equality of sacrifice in the total defense effort from the point of view not of men but of relative expenditures—dollars, not men—we find no great disparity between what the British and French have been demanding of their people and what we have been demanding of ours.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert table II which compares the percentage of gross national product devoted to defense in the United States with the principal countries of Western Europe.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE II.—Percentage of gross national product devoted to national defense—United States, United Kingdom, France, and Italy

Country	Defense budget (millions)		Percent of gross national product
	Present rate	1951 rate	Present rate	1951 rate
United Kingdom	2,380	3,108	6.4	8.0
France	1,640	2,451	7.3	9.7
Italy	595	915	4.5	6.4
United States	[1] 25,000	(2)	8.7	(2)

[1] Estimated present annual rate. Appropriations have totaled about $47.7 billion which would be 16.7 percent of the gross national product, but we are not spending as fast as we appropriate.

Mr MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois may yield for a question only.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield for a very brief observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to suggest that the degree of peril should also have some relationship to the degree of preparedness.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, certainly; but, if the Senator will permit me to show these figures——

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am coming back.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought the Senator was going to be like Captain Shotover in Bernard Shaw's Heartbreak House, who would always ask questions and then go out the door before anyone could answer them.

Mr. MILLIKIN. No; I never get on a bicycle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Table II which I have incorporated in the RECORD shows the defense budget of the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and the United States, and the percentage relationship of that budget to the gross national product of those countries. The gross national product, though it is a substantially accurate figure, is somewhat higher than national income, since it includes such items as interest on the national debt and payments to veterans, for which no current services are being given, and does not deduct anything for depreciation.

At the present rate, the percentage of gross national product devoted to national defense in the United States is 8.7; in the United Kingdom, 6.4; in France, 7.3; and in Italy, 4.5. The disparities between those three countries except for Italy, which is limited by the peace treaty, and our own country at the present rate of expenditures are therefore significantly small. This is shown graphically by the chart which I have here placed on this easel.

I may say that I took the American figure at the present rate of $25,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief observation?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for a brief observation by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe my observation will throw some light upon the proposition stated by the Senator from Illinois. I understand the figures named are percentages of the gross national product at the present rate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think it should be made clear that the national product itself was not too large. The British have been living under a program of austerity. The American people have been enjoying a relatively high standard of living. The average workingman in England has been suffering from low wages and high prices. A man who is receiving only $800 a year would be paying the lion's share, but if we take such a percentage from a man who receives $10,000 a year, it is merely spending money. These percentages are more of a sacrifice in terms of the national product than is the percentage of 8.7 in the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Minnesota moves so quickly that I no sooner mention a point than he draws a logical conclusion with reference to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am moved by the Senator's argument. I have a sensitiveness to the logic which he is putting forth.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Until we get a chance to study the President's budget message which came here only an hour or two ago, we are not, of course, able to project a rate for the United States, but I think the rate projected for Britain, France, and Italy is of the greatest significance, in view of the effort it reveals.

I have spent a little time in trying to study the budgets for 1951 for those nations. In brief, they show that the British rate will rise from 6.4 to 8 percent of the gross national product, while the French rate will go up from 7.3 to 9.7, or virtually 10 percent. Even the Italian rate will increase to 6.4 percent. These figures show that the European countries are buckling down to the task—and the budgets were presented before the Brussels conference, I think—and that France, whose willingness to sacrifice has been so disparaged, has, on a comparative basis, probably been doing the best of all.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a clarifying inquiry?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wonder if the charts which the able Senator has presented show the total expenditures and projected expenditures for the several countries out of their own funds, or whether the rate of expenditure includes expenditures from the arms-implementation aid for which they are getting United States funds.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They come from their appropriations, and, therefore, would not include military equipment directly furnished by this country. Cash contributions from this country probably are included but I do not have any record of their amount.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let me ask one additional question for clarification. Of course, the Senator, in pointing out the various considerations, all of which are properly brought before the Congress of the United States, I am sure, would not lose sight of the fact that the cost of fitting and equipping a division in France, Britain, or Belgium, is nowhere near comparable to the cost of equipping a division in the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall point that out in a few moments. It strengthens the point I am trying to make, that their contributions will be greater than is indicated by the budget itself.

Mr. KNOWLAND. But, by the same token, for the same amount of money they would be getting more divisions proportionately than we would get.

Mr. DOUGLAS. These comparisons are in proportion to income, not total amounts of money.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not had the opportunity to examine the French budget in the detail which I should have liked to examine it. There may be some padding of military expenditures in the current French budget. I am told that in previous years military expenditures in France have sometimes been concealed in civilian expenditures. There is a possibility that this year the French may have concealed some civilian expenditures in the military budget, and that, therefore, the figures for next year may somewhat exaggerate the French effort. I want to put that in as a clarification. Nevertheless, it is probable that these inclusions are not grossly significant in amount. The evidence does indicate that the French, on the whole, have been doing quite well.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. That was exactly what I was going to ask.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought from the gleam in the eye of the Senator from Michigan that that was what he was going to ask, and that therefore I should make the point before he did. I was, however, going to make it anyway.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator has the correct analysis of the gleam.

PERCENTAGE OF PER CAPITA INCOME DEVOTED TO DEFENSE

Mr. DOUGLAS. Given our enormous per capita income, Mr. President, and the after effects of World War II in Europe, it is perhaps unfair to compare the United States, British, French, and Italian defense efforts in terms of amounts spent per capita. In table III which I shall insert, I have done just that, but I then made a second comparison in the same table of the percentage of per capita income spent for defense purposes.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks table III, which compares the United States with the principal Western European countries on the basis of percentage of per capita income devoted to defense.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE III.—Percentage of per capita income spent for defense purposes—United States, United Kingdom, France, and Italy

Country	Population (millions) [1]	Defense budget (Millions of United States dollars) [2]		Per capita expenditure for defense (United States dollars)		Per capita income (United States dollars) [3]	Percentage of per capita income spent for defense
		Present rate	1951 rate	Present rate	1951 rate		Present	1951
United Kingdom	50.6	2,380	3,108	47	61	773	6	8
France	41.6	1,640	2,451	39	59	482	8	12
Italy	46.3	595	915	13	20	235	5½	8½
United States	152.3	[4] 25,000	[5]	164	[5]	1,453	11	[5]

[4] See note 1 of table II.
[5] Not available.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, at first glance, it would seem that the United States is contributing much more on a per capita basis than the other countries. However, when we consider the much lower per capita income of these countries compared to that of the United States, we get a very different picture. When we compare the percentage of per capita income spent for defense, we find that now, the United Kingdom spends 6 percent; France, 8 percent; Italy, 5½ percent; and the United States, 11 percent. In 1951, the rate will be United Kingdom, 8 percent; France, 12 percent; and Italy, 8½ percent. I do not have the 1951 figures for the United States. Thus, by comparing the percentages of per capita income spent for defense, we find the figures even closer.

Furthermore, it is much more difficult for a country with a small per capita income to spend the same percentage for defense as a country like the United States, with a high per capita income. Or, conversely, with a high income a country can spend more with no greater sacrifice. It can spend a larger percentage for defense with no greater sacrifice, possibly with less sacrifice, than can a poorer nation. It is this principle which lies behind our use of the graduated income tax for individuals. I am not saying that Western Europe is contributing more than we are. But I do say that the difference is not nearly as great as is commonly believed.

THE MILITARY DOLLAR GOES FARTHER IN WESTERN EUROPE

There is yet another factor to which the Senator from California referred, which makes the European sacrifice greater than it seems to be even on the basis of relative money figures. This is the fact that a considerable portion of our military expenditures goes to provide a relatively high scale of pay and of comforts for our troops in comparison with those enjoyed by the European soldier whose pay is insignificant and whose comforts are meager.

This means that there is a greater sacrifice per European soldier and his family, which does not show up in the money figures, than is the case with us. I hasten to add that, of course, I approve of the American system, since we certainly should not discriminate against the soldier in favor of the stay-at-home. But this fact should make us realize more vividly the nature of the real sacrifices which the peoples of the European countries are already making. This point is further strengthened when we remember that the cost of producing the same machine gun, cannon, shell, airplane, or ship is much greater in the United States than abroad and that they consequently can buy more defense with less money than we.

So, Mr. President, whatever one can say about the lack of sacrifice by the European countries in Korea, and we should recall that they are, of course, heavily committed in Indochina and Malaya, in Western Europe we are decidedly not offering to defend nations which have refused to meet their own military commitments. They are doing pretty well. I do not think this debate should therefore proceed on an assumption which facts show to be completely unwarranted.

I have said some rather bitter things this afternoon which I think, nevertheless, are true, although in saying them, it should be remembered that the nations are heavily charged with many burdens. I think that in the long run the fact that all the nations of the world have contributed only about 20,000 troops to back up the United Nations in Korea in comparison with our approximately 140,000 is something which the people of Great Britain and France will ultimately regret when they have learned the truth. But whatever we may say about their failure to support the United Nations action in Korea, they are doing fairly well so far as their total contribution to their own defense is concerned.

So much for the first fallacy in the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

B. THE SHARE OF WESTERN EUROPE UNDER THE BRUSSELS AGREEMENT

A second fallacy in the Senator's assumption that Europe lacks a willingness to resist is revealed by the relative proportions of the future European army which, according to the best unofficial estimates, are to be contributed by us and by the other countries.

According to press reports, and as repeated on the floor of the Senate, it is estimated that the Brussels Agreement calls for a total ground force by the end of 1953, or somewhat earlier, of about 55 combat divisions. On the basis of the repeated and responsible press speculations as to the agreed ratios of troop contributions, apparently only 10 of these divisions are to be furnished by us while Western Europe is to supply the balance, with the question of Western Germany's participation still to be worked out. Instead of the United States being expected to furnish the major portion of the Western European army, as so many believe, if these reports are even reasonably accurate, we are obligated in fact to furnish a little less than a fifth, or about 18 percent of the total. Even if it is impossible to get the West Germans to contribute the quota desired of them, the American share on the basis of the lower ratio estimates of 3½ to 1 would still be only two-ninths, or 22 percent of the total.

When we take into consideration the supply troops and reserve components which France and England would undoubtedly furnish and the relatively greater dangers which the civilian populations of Western Europe would experience, it should become crystal clear that the overwhelming proportion of the military burden of the hardships will still be borne by the Western Europeans. This is only proper, because they are the ones who stand to lose most from conquest by the Communists. But it also happens to be not only proper, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, but apparently also true that they will have the main burden.

C. WILL 10 UNITED STATES DIVISIONS DO ANY GOOD?

The third strand in the first argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], that Western Europe will not cooperate, is indicated by his query on the floor of the Senate as to what good 10 divisions will do, and by his still more extraordinary statement that even a million and a half of our men would not be enough to save Europe. Of course, his position is partially based on the assumption that the Western European nations are shirking their job and that they will not contribute enough under the Brussels agreement. I think I have shown that these assumptions are contrary to the fact.

Here again the Senator from Ohio, for all his ability—and it is great—misses the real point most grievously. No one contends that 10 divisions by themselves could stop the Communist armies. Perhaps even a million and a half men could not do so, although it is possible that they might, if we furnished them with adequate equipment and fire power. But the 10 American divisions, as we have shown, would merely be additions or increments to a European force which would be from four to five times larger. Moreover, the American forces would be the vital increment which would to a great extent create the willingness of Western Europeans to enlarge their armies. For Western Europe is largely in the following position: They have been doing about as well as we in arming, but they do not want to make the extra effort or to take the risk of attack unless we contribute our share of the added effort and unless we stand along with them. If we add 8 more divisions to our existing 2 in Western Germany, the European nations will add from 28 to 36 more. If we refuse, they will probably not add any and may indeed throw in the sponge.

What we should really take into account, therefore, is not the 10 divisions which we furnish, but the added 28 to 36 which they will call forth. Ten divisions will not be able to hold the Communists, but 55 will have a good chance of doing so. Anyone who has ever tried to raise money for a charity or a college knows the evocative power of the contingent gift. When a man says "I will give a million, provided others will give three million," he imparts hope to the fund raisers and makes it easier for others to give. For they know that their gifts will carry with them a portion of the contingent gift, and hence provide a sum greater than that which they directly furnish.

It is by this principle that Tolstoi and Lloyd Douglas explain the miracle of the loaves and fishes. For in their version, nearly everyone who went out into the desert with Jesus had bread and fish in their pockets, but did not want to take their lunch out to eat, lest others ask them for a share. But our Saviour, by sharing what he had with the needy, made them somewhat ashamed of themselves, so the multitude took out what they had and shared it. And when they had done this, there was more than enough for all.

There is a direct moral in this story which followers of Senator TAFT would do well to ponder. Nor is any such venture of faith required of us as that which our Saviour made. For the response of our allies will not be conjectural but contractual. If we put up 8 more divisions, they will put up from 28 to 36 more.

2. WILL AIR AND SEA POWER AID TO WESTERN EUROPE BE ENOUGH?

Now may I take up the second main argument of the Senator from Ohio, namely, that we will be making an ample contribution toward the defense of Europe by using our air and sea power and virtually that alone without land forces.

The experience of World War II and the experience of Korea, Mr. President, have surely taught us that air attacks will not stop land armies. I am not overlooking the point made here on the floor by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], that in Korea our air forces were prohibited from attacking the major sources of Communist supplies behind the Manchurian border. But neither did they deter the continued advances on the Korean Peninsula itself of Communist infantry possessed of superior numbers and willing to take huge losses, even though almost throughout the entire Korean campaign we had the mastery of the air and could bomb both the front line and the enemy bases in northern Korea.

In World War II we found that air attacks as a deterrent to enemy troop advances were feasible only in opening up a temporary beachhead or permitting a limited withdrawal. And even in these cases how many times did not the Army and the Marines find that an area that was alleged by the Air Force to have been cleared by our air operations bristled when the troops arrived, with not only the infantry, but the artillery and in some cases the tanks of the enemy. Those who fought at Tarawa, Pelelieu, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa know to the full the bitter truth of this statement.

But would not the atomic bomb and the still more powerful H-bomb prevent the Russians and their satellites from conquering Western Europe? I would state that I do not believe that the use of the atomic bomb on Russian troops before they engaged the troops of our western allies would by itself deter the Red Army from overrunning the continent. Moreover, if the A-bomb were dropped upon the Communist armies when they were closely locked in combat with the western Europeans, it might do almost as much harm to our allies as to our enemies.

But is the H-bomb, which Mr. W. L. Laurence estimates may possibly destroy everything within an area of 300 square miles, a sure defense against land armies? All I can say is that I understand it is still a gamble as to whether the H-bomb will actually go off and that, even if it does, its military effect is still uncertain. It is, therefore, foolish to put our trust in something which may never materialize.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to say that although it may still be a gamble, as the Senator from Illinois says, whether the H-bomb would actually go off, if it were to go off its military effect would not be uncertain. I say to the Senator that if it did go off its military effect would be very certain indeed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But it might destroy as many of our troops as it would destroy enemy troops if it went off while the troops were closely locked in combat.

Mr. McMAHON. It would not be dropped at that point of combat.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The only conclusion we can draw from all this is that our air power by itself will not stop the Communist troops from moving to the English Channel. An adequate supply of ground troops will be needed to do that. Infantry and artillery are still needed, as Korea has shown, and all the scientific push-buttons and military gadgets have not made them obsolete.

What the proposal of the Senator from Ohio in effect amounts to is, therefore, that we should reconcile ourselves to letting the Communists take over Western Europe. Indeed, when I pressed him on this point in the debate on January 5, with the candor which makes us all admire him even when we disagree with him, he replied that such in effect would be the consequences.

But Mr. TAFT apparently believes that even though the continent of Europe were to fall, we would still be able to retain Britain as an air base from which we could launch retaliatory attacks and destroy the heavy industry of Europe in order to prevent its being used by the Russians.

Two comments are sufficient on this latter point. In the first place, island bases, whether relied upon as a protective screen or as a place from which to harass the European and Asiatic continents, cannot be held for long in the days of robot bombs, guided missiles, and so on. In the Second World War we learned how to use antiaircraft fire against the V–1. It was, however, powerless against the V–2 even in 1944, and their captive German scientists have no doubt helped the Russians vastly improve the V–2 model. Unless the source of the enemy's missiles can be pushed back by ground action, an island base on the periphery of a continent already lost is, therefore, the constant object of attrition. If the continent of Europe falls, then England, only 20 miles across the channel, despite all its heroism, can either be neutralized or forced to give up. We will then lose the very island bases upon which Mr. Hoover and the Senator from Ohio so greatly depend.

HOW NOT TO WIN FRIENDS AND INFLUENCE PEOPLE

The Europeans, moreover, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has pointed out, cannot be thrilled with joy by the fact that the Senator from Ohio first offers them aerial aid which he admits will be ineffective and then promises them that after this has failed, he will destroy their industrial plant and possibly their cities by attacks from the air. This is hardly the way to win friends and influence people and, in fact, almost no better way than this could be devised to develop anti-American and pro-Russian sentiment on the continent of Europe.

Now suppose we were to adopt the policy of the Senator from Ohio of refusing to support Western Europe with ground troops and offering air and sea power only. It would, in effect, withdraw our strength from continental Western Europe and create a power vacuum which the Communists would inevitably fill. For, while we do not at present have a large force of ground troops there, the potential of further American ground forces plus our possession of the atom bomb has been the force which has heretofore filled the vacuum. It has at once kept the Russians at bay and the anti-Communist governments in power.

The freedom-loving peoples of Western Europe would certainly feel that they had been abandoned if after having assurances of our help, we were suddenly to deny it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield for an observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to bring to the Senator's attention what is fairly well known in postwar history, namely, that if American forces had not been in Austria—for one example, Vienna—on repeated occasions the Russians would have moved in and taken over the entire country. I think that is the thesis which the Senator is advancing here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. All we have to do is to leave a vacuum, and Mr. Stalin has plenty of force ready to move into the vacuum. We found that out in the Berlin area, and in every other place where our occupation forces were located.

It seems to me that rather than try to project an argument into the future, as the Senator from Ohio is trying to do, the wise thing to do would be to observe what is going on in the world now. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he check into the political and military history which centers around Austria. Time after time there has occurred the very thing which the Senator from Illinois has pointed out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the observation of the Senator from Minnesota may be conveyed to the Senator from Ohio.

Faced with the prospect of a long-drawn-out war, many western Europeans might feel it to their advantage to join wholeheartedly with Russia, and willingly produce for and fight with them against us because of this abandonment.

Pro-American governments would fall on all sides, and the Communists would seize power as they did in Czechoslovakia. We remember Czechoslovakia as one of our best friends in Europe. But once the Communists seized power, suppressed free speech and free press, and purged the anti-Communists, Czechoslovakia became our enemy and will now, if called upon, fight against us. I am not sure the people of Czechoslovakia will like this, but their rulers will compel it.

We cannot consider this problem by itself. In the first place, the two possibilities of having Western Europe fight or not fight the Communists are not the only ones. We should also consider the possibility of Europe fighting against us. There are strong Communist elements in these countries and when they are coupled with the neutralists, appeasers, and those who would become disgruntled with our refusal to help defend Western Europe, the ranks of the Communist armies might be further filled and the productive might of Western Europe might be willingly turned against us.

HOW TO WIN FRIENDS AND INFLUENCE PEOPLE

But what if we show a genuine desire to cooperate on terms of equal sacrifice with the countries of Western Europe? We would be telling them, "We will help to defend you at once. We will not wait until you are conquered, but will do everything in our power to prevent you from being conquered and do it immediately. We will fight with you, side by side. If we are ultimately pushed off the Continent we will regroup our joint forces and fight on from England. If we are pushed out of England, we will again regroup and fight on from America. We will never give up. We will never let you down. And we mean it. For we consider your security as our security."

What kind of a response would this get? Of course the Communists might say it would be an act of war. But to freedom-loving people it would be hope; and this hope would be the rallying focus about which all the anti-Communist forces of the world could unite and stop the Russian onslaught.

Suppose after a hard struggle, we were ultimately pushed out of Europe. The people there—knowing that we had honorably fought for their defense and knowing that we would never give up, would certainly be encouraged to go underground and to form as effective resistence units as possible. Their cooperation with the Communists would take place only at gun-point. But if we abandon Western Europe, do not be surprised if they more compliantly fight and produce against us.

We simply must recognize this foreign and military policy problem for what it is—it is a problem of survival. I have great faith in American fighting men and American productive capacity. But if we decide on a policy of abandoning Europe, we should face the consequence of having nearly the whole world against us. Perhaps we could ultimately win such a war—perhaps not. But one thing is certain. If war does come, it would be far better to have the manpower and productive might of Western Europe on our side. Even though the Russians might ultimately take it over, we would still have most of the people on our side. To the degree that resistance is possible in a police state and on a lost continent, Russia would be weakened by the opposition of the people. But if we abandon them, the people might well be against us.

Even were we to win the final war, with the people of all of continental Europe against us, it would take years longer, sap our strength and cause the loss of hundreds of thousands more lives than if we had the cooperation of Europe.

We cannot and should not attempt to pull in our forces, abandon our allies, and try to fight the Communist world alone. It would be a great mistake, and it could very well lose a war.

3. WILL SENDING UNITED STATES TROOPS TO WESTERN EUROPE PROVOKE RUSSIA TO WAR?

Then, Mr. President, we are told that committing American troops to the land defense of Europe would stimulate the Russians to attack. That argument virtually says you should maintain yourself in a position of permanent inferiority lest you offend someone who is stronger. The end result is always to put yourselves at the mercy of the strong, whereas I believe that nothing in recent American foreign policy has been so clearly correct as the view that one must build up areas of strength from which to negotiate. The trouble has been that while we have talked about this, we have not built up the military strength required to defend the areas which we have so blithely talked about. It is not enough to have young men in tweed suits on Foggy Bottom write memoranda about "areas of strength." It is necessary to have men in khaki who will make this talk come true.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from North Dakota well knows that there is no Member of the Senate whom I like more than I do him. I should very much like to yield for a question, provided it does not take too long.

Mr. LANGER. It is a very simple question. If we have not built up the necessary strength, whose fault is it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is our fault. A part of the fault lies right here in Congress.

Mr. LANGER. Whose fault is it, that of the Democrats or the Republicans?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Both. It is the fault of the administration, the Democrats, and the Republicans. I must confess that I think I have some share of the guilt myself. I think the Senator from North Dakota may have a little share of the guilt.

Mr. LANGER. Is it not true that the Democrats have been in charge of the Government ever since 1932? The distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] mentioned the Berlin airlift. Whose fault was it that the Russians had all the land surrounding Berlin? He mentioned Austria, and particularly Vienna. Whose fault was it that all around Vienna the Russians had full and absolute control? Whose fault was it that American blood was shed to take the northern part of Austria? When the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] was High Commissioner over there, whose fault was it that he received an order to surrender all that territory to Joe Stalin?

As I understand the situation now, the distinguished Senator from Illinois is going all over the world. If we do not whip the enemy in Germany we will whip him in Austria. If we do not whip him there, we will attack him in Russia.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not say that.

Mr. LANGER. If we do not win there, we are going to defend India. If we do not win there, we are going into China.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not say that, either. The Senator from North Dakota is letting his imagination carry him away.

Mr. LANGER. Did not my distinguished friend say a moment ago that no matter where the enemy was, we would fight him there?

Mr. DOUGLAS. In my judgment, we should resist Communist aggression everywhere with two provisos: First, that the places are militarily accessible; second, that other countries help us in adequate numbers.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am torn between my affection for my dear friend and my desire to finish my speech before midnight.

Mr. LANGER. I should like to ask the Senator just one more question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield for one more question.

Mr. LANGER. I want my distinguished friend to tell me where all the young men—and old men—are to come from to defend countries all over the world. We have not got them in this country.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They should come from the free world as a whole. Of course, we cannot resist Communist aggression all over the world by ourselves without help. Other non-Communist countries should share the burden. But what I do say is that if we can encourage such help by our own willingness to resist aggression, it would be far better than letting the Communists take over the whole world, even excepting the Western Hemisphere. For, if we do not resist this aggression now, I say that we will be alone, without allies, to face the Communists. I would rather the young men—and the old men—had allies with them if we have to fight Russia than for them to face Russia alone.

It could only have been an injudicious and hasty remark of the senior Senator from Ohio after his formal address of January 5 when he said during a colloquy that the United States, to the people of Europe, might appear the main instigators of war, presumably by drawing a defense line on the European continent and thus provoking Russian aggression. I hope that statement does not reflect the considered opinion of the Senator from Ohio, and I feel sure it does not. I think that was a hasty statement which he injudiciously made. I hope very much that it does not reflect his considered opinion. Without his intending it, I think it has already done a great deal of harm and will do more unless corrected. For the only implication the average man could draw from his statement "if we are the main instigators of the war" is that we would be the instigators if we sent men and arms to Europe. This statement can be used against us in Europe even though it will not be so.

Mr. President, at this late day it can hardly be true either in Europe or America that we must still debate what power appears to be the main instigator of world war III, if that war should come upon us. There are plenty of issues which do need debate, as my own remarks today explicitly assume. But this is certainly not one. We have but to examine the record, Mr. President, to see whether Russia or the United States has been the more vigorous seeker of peace.

WHO HAS BEEN THE MORE VIGOROUS SEEKER OF PEACE, THE UNITED STATES OR RUSSIA?

I should like to touch very briefly on the history of the 5½ years between World War II and the Korean War. After World War II we disarmed from a military strength of 13,000,000 men to 1,500,000 with a scant 12 divisions prior to the Korean attack. Russia probably did not cut its total force by more than one-half and now has 175 divisions, which, as compared with our somewhat larger tables of organization, would probably be the equivalent of 135 to 140 American divisions.

We offered to share the secret of atomic energy with the whole world, including Russia and to denature our atomic bombs, provided only that there should be an adequate international inspection to which we ourselves would be subject, to prevent any country from making atomic bombs. Russia refused to agree to this international inspection.

We sought, through the United Nations, to create a pooled force to resist aggression. Russia failed to cooperate. Russia has hamstrung the United Nations by using the veto no less than 44 times, even prior to the Korean crisis.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must say now to my dear friend from North Dakota that I cannot.

Mr. LANGER. Just one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERR in the chair). The Senator from Illinois says he cannot yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from North Dakota said he would ask me to yield for just one more question a while ago, and I yielded to him. But that apparently——

Mr. LANGER. The distinguished Senator from Illinois is now condemning the veto power. Who is to blame for the veto power being in existence if not America and England

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator saying we should not have the veto power in the United Nations?

Mr. LANGER. Certainly I said that the veto power should not be included in the Charter. I followed the lead of the Prime Minister of Australia who wanted to carry out the principle of the Atlantic Charter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought it was the fear of the Senator from North Dakota and other Senators like himself which made the State Department feel that no treaty which deprived the United States of the veto power could be ratified on the floor of the Senate. I had thought that the Senator from North Dakota, whom I love, is one of the men who throughout has argued that there should be no abolition of the veto power.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator from Illinois. If he will read my speech, when I voted against the adoption of the UN Charter, he will find that I said I voted against the United Nations Charter, among other reasons, because it contained the veto power. Other Senators compared the situation to that when the Thirteen Colonies were organized into the United States. If the veto power had been in the Constitution, does the Senator from Illinois suppose that, for example, South Carolina would have joined the Union with New York having the veto power over South Carolina?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am delighted to know that the vote of the Senator from North Dakota, which was one of the two votes, I believe, cast against the United Nations—was because the UN was not powerful enough.

Mr. LANGER. That is right.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The general fear was that if the veto power was abolished most Senators would feel that the UN had been given too much power. Apparently the arguments now are that it was "either too hot or too cold, either too young or too old." The fear of surrendering too much sovereignty to this new organization was substantial, and I had always felt that this was the reason for inserting the veto clause.

Mr. LANGER. Oh, no, Mr. President. I will say to my dear friend that the situation at that time was that we had 13,000,000 men.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is out of order.

Mr. LANGER. We had 13,000,000 men under arms at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I would rather not yield to my distinguished friend at this time. I should like to develop my speech.

Looking further at the record, we have helped to organize international agencies to enhance the arts of peace, such as WHO, FAO, the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund, UNESCO, and others. Russia has refused to join any one of them. We have sought to negotiate treaties for Italy, Austria, Germany, and Japan. After nearly 2 years of wrangling, we finally got a treaty with Italy, but Russia has stopped all others.

Russia refused to join in the pledge of Secretary Byrnes for first a 20-year, and then a 40-year joint occupation of a united Germany. This would have allowed the people of both East and West Germany to live together and at the same time would have offered Russia protection from the fear of a German attack which she felt was real.

We have stripped ourselves of our colonial empire by freeing the Philippines and giving up any rights to intervene in Cuba.

Russia acted in direct violation of the Yalta agreement. The trouble was not so much in the European features of the Yalta agreement as in the violation of the Yalta agreement by Russia.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, I prefer not to yield at this time. Russia did not permit free elections in Poland, Bulgaria, or Rumania, and applied covert military pressure upon Hungary and Czechoslovakia to make them go Communist.

We offered ECA aid to all of Europe, including Russia and her satellites. Russia not only refused to come in herself, but also prevented her European satellites from coming in.

Russia kept troops in Persia in 1946, violating a previous pledge, and threatened Turkey. She conducted border warfare against Greece in 1946 and 1947, and in 1948 she suspended our land transportation to Berlin.

In the face of this record, I cannot see how anyone could ever say that we would be the "main instigator" of a war by sending troops to Europe as a defensive measure. Were we to mass 10,000,000 men over there, the charge might conceivably be made. Senator TAFT says that 10 divisions could not deter Russia conquering Europe, and I say it will be of tremendous help. But it can obviously be helpful only for defense, and in no sense could such a force be considered enough to wage an aggressive war against Russia. No one proposes an invasion of the land mass of Russia. Certainly I do not propose it.

WE HAVE EVERY REASON TO FEAR RUSSIAN AGGRESSION

But we are now in January 1951. A totalitarian power which most of us have long believed was committed by its very nature to a garrison state threatening expansion, has now committed its largest satellite, China, to the risk of a general war. Acting through the United Nations we prevented Russian aggression in Iran, in the Dardanelles and in Greece. Acting with our British and French allies, we prevented the Russian seizure of Berlin.

Wherever we showed strength to resist Communist aggression the Russians backed down.

Last June 24, however, the forces of world communism, solidly backed by Russia, committed armed military aggression across the whole of a national frontier. Korea, Mr. President, is all too grim and bloody a fact, as is known to many American families. If war comes, it will have been instigated by Russia, not by us. And we should not by an injudicious use of words, such as the Senator from Ohio's [Mr. TAFT'S] statement implying that we would be the main instigators of a war if we sent additional troops to Western Europe, give the Russians a propaganda weapon which, though untrue, can be and is being used against us.

In his speech of January 8 before the National Press Club, the Senator from Ohio laughed at the reputed statement of one of our military officers that it would be easier to get 10 American divisions out of Europe if war came than to get 2 out. That he says, is a poor reason for sending the additional eight.

Mr. President, if we send 10 United States divisions to Europe, or send there the million and a half United States troops the Senator at one point mentions, we shall not send them to get them out again if war comes. We shall send them to help hold a line beyond the Rhine—not upon it, as the Senator from Ohio fears, and to hold it along with four times as many Europeans—until reinforcements from all the North Atlantic countries arrive. But we shall not, of course, agree to hold such line with only American troops, and I know of no one who advocates such a policy.

SHALL WE WAIT FOR ENGRAVED INVITATIONS FROM A UNANIMOUS EUROPE?

The Senator from Ohio says, however, that even the participation of American troops in a western European land defense would no doubt spur Russia to attack, because Russia would believe that the project had been undertaken upon American initiative. I think that is a very neat logical box, since our great power would truly appear to give us the initiative in any joint venture with Britain, France, the Low Countries and the other European nations, regardless of whether or not they had taken the initiative in extending the formal invitation. I doubt that any engraved invitation from Western Europe would take the onus of American initiative off the project, either to the Russians or to ourselves.

I must confess that I agree with the Senator from Ohio that we should only help to defend these nations which will help themselves, and that we should have their invitation so to do, but I am at a loss as to why, in his address, he constantly emphasized the importance of formal invitations for our aid. The enemy we face, I am afraid, does not regard us the more kindly because we place our strength only where we are formally invited to place it. Our good intentions may save us with many peoples—though I am inclined to doubt the fact—but they will never save us from the ruthless men who have marked us out as their natural enemies.

Our very existence, to say nothing of the mobilization of our forces on which all of us agree, can be said to be provocative to the Russians. I do not see how the promise to send 10 divisions to Europe when we have them to send will increase the degree of that provocation. As I shall attempt to show later in my remarks, such a promise may in fact provoke the rulers of the Kremlin to a more sober understanding of their true position.

NOT BEING WILLING TO SEND TROOPS TO WESTERN EUROPE WOULD BE MORE LIKELY TO CAUSE A RUSSIAN ATTACK

Moreover, the evident belief of the Senator from Ohio that we should not strengthen Europe lest we provoke the Russians to attack is equivalent to saying that the weak must not strengthen themselves relative to the strong lest the strong should take alarm. But this condemns the weak to continue in a state of inferiority to the strong and means that they exist only on the sufferance of the powerful. This is not a very safe source of protection when we are dealing with Communist Russia. It is far better for us and our allies to win this protection by our own efforts. Our combined armed strength will be a greater deterrent to Russian aggression than any feeling of pity or any qualms of conscience which may develop inside the breasts of the members of the politboro. For I have never known the Russians to spare anyone because they were weak.

On the contrary, I think history shows that weakness, not strength, provokes aggression and is much more likely to lead to war. Where have the Communist gains been made, Mr. President? They have been made in the weak Baltic and Balkan countries and in Czechoslovakia which had no hope of our aid. They have been made in a weak and divided China which we did not think we could defend, and as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has pointed out, they now seem to be making gains in Korea from which we originally withdrew our troops.

The danger confronting us is a totalitarian Communist danger. The record of their gains, Mr. President, gives conclusive proof that it is the weak and not the strong who are in danger, and if there is any hope for peace with Russia, we will find it in strength.

4. WILL THE COSTS OF SENDING ADEQUATE TROOPS TO WESTERN EUROPE BE TOO HIGH?

The fourth and final objection which Senator TAFT makes against accepting the Brussels agreement is that it will cost too much. I shall deal later and in some detail with this contention. Let it be enough to say here that the Senator from Ohio would tailor our security to fit his conception of proper military costs instead of adjusting our military costs to conform to the needs of true security.

What, then, shall we say of the argument of the Senator from Ohio as a whole? Simply this—never have I seen so plausible a set of contentions based upon so many false premises. I say this with sorrow mixed with sympathetic affection.

V. THE POSITIVE ARGUMENT FOR THE BRUSSELS AGREEMENT

Mr. President, thus far in the argument I have dealt with two negatives and two positives with respect to our policy in Europe. I must agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and many other Senators in so far as the two negatives are concerned. We are not legally bound to furnish more troops than we already have for the joint defense of the Atlantic Pact countries, and we are not morally bound so to do. On one of the positives the Senator from Ohio agrees with me; namely, that we are bound to furnish arms aid to the signatories of the Atlantic Pact instrument. The other positive, of course, is that our self-interest demands that we help the Europeans in the land, sea, and air defense of the European continent; and that is the organic kernel of this entire debate so far as the Brussels agreement and the defense of Western Europe are concerned.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. President, I should like to have done with the negatives. I shall deal with the positive argument for Congressional approval of the principle of the Brussels agreement; namely, the sending of more troops to Western Europe. Beside the great positive factor of our national self-interest, I should like briefly to array another, the moral climate shared by the peoples of Europe and America. I shall not hang back if some legalistic critic transmutes "moral climate" into "moral responsibility."

Mr. President, it was the vacuum left between Russia and the United States after World War II which most powerfully affected developments in our foreign policy, and made us pour billions of our substance into Western Europe. It was the desire to transfer to the nations of Western Europe both power and the responsibility which goes with power, which led us to embrace the Marshall program. Had the nations of that area been unrelated to us in everything save their abhorrence of the totalitarian police state, I believe the Congress would yet have approved the European recovery program.

But the significant point, Mr. President, is that despite the existence of sizable Communist parties in some of the European countries, none but the most fatuous American critics doubted our kinship with those peoples. Dealing with the peoples of Western Europe, Mr. President, we are dealing with those who taught Jefferson and Madison and other early Americans about the democratic experiment, and were taught by them in turn.

WESTERN CIVILIZATION ITSELF IS AT STAKE

But the issue is even broader than the survival of any political philosophy, even one which can call out so bravely what there is of good in man. Western civilization itself is at stake, and the democratic form of government is but one element in that great complex. The peoples of Western Europe and America are the heirs of the most dynamic tradition the world has ever seen. There are men in other regions of the earth just as brave, just as thoughtful, as are those of the West, and I am mindful of the great—in some instances, the unique—contributions of the culture of the East. But, Mr. President, it is in the West, it is among the heirs of a civilization cradled in the Mediterranean and nurtured in the northern fastnesses of Europe, that the dignity, the worth, and the rights of the individual man have been most strongly asserted. To the peoples of the West, life is dear, and it ought not to be sold for something that is not dear.

Animated by this conviction, the people of the United States wield a power greater even than their great resources could by themselves command. They could look the world over for allies more alert to the power of this faith than our partners in the Atlantic Pact and the Brussels agreement. By the same token it is not only our great economic power which turns European eyes toward these shores. Even the very presence of their American brothers in the joint force of the Brussels nations, the fact that American divisions stood on European soil for this express purpose, conceivably could end whatever hesitancies the Europeans have thus far shown toward their own commitments. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made a significant contribution, I think, when they reminded us that men are more tangible than diplomatic instruments.

All I am saying, Mr. President, is that it was not only the precise conditions left by World War II, not only our self-interest in keeping Western Europe from going the way of Czechoslovakia, which caused the Congress to embrace the Marshall plan. It was a marriage between members of a common society, wedded to common ideals, moved by common hopes—and common fears.

The Atlantic Pact, and the consequent agreement at Brussels, shows the same recognition. The seed of the pact, the resolution honored by the name of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], was quite properly an expression of American self-interest. The principles of the Brussels agreement deserve the sanction of Congress for that paramount reason. But, Mr. President, if the danger of imminent war is great—and I think it is—the Brussels nations are a magnet to draw to a common task and a common victory precisely those men who have the most to live for, the most to die for, of all men on the face of the earth. Those are good men to have beside you when the battle for survival is joined, Mr. President. Mr. President, on this floor I have criticized very strenuously British foreign policy, but no one can criticize the heroism of the British soldier under fire. No one can criticize the bravery of the French soldier under fire. They are good men to have with us.

CONGRESS SHOULD PLACE ITS STAMP OF APPROVAL ON THE PRINCIPLES OF THE BRUSSELS AGREEMENT

So much for the moral imperative, Mr. President, and I do not apologize for touching on it briefly, since I firmly believe it is a definite quantity in the arsenal which the Communists will challenge at their peril.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I regret to say that I cannot yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am asking that Congress, as the immediate representatives of the people, stamp its formal approval on the sending of more troops to Western Europe as is embodied in the agreement made at Brussels. The people will rightly ask what more tangible assets are represented in the force General Eisenhower has been sent to command.

In the course of my remarks on the views of those who would leave the land defenses of Europe to the Europeans, I analyzed the scale of armed men and monies by which the Brussels nations intend to defend themselves. I pointed out that equality of sacrifice is an approximate fact, and that the military increment of the 225,000,000 people of Western Europe will match, on a per capita basis, the military increment of our own 150,000,000. The most positive argument for the Brussels agreement is the willingness of the Europeans to help themselves.

UNITED STATES AND WESTERN EUROPE SHOULD BUILD UP THEIR STRENGTH TOGETHER

This principle can and, in my judgment, should be carried out in the process by which the ultimate goals are obtained as well as merely in those goals themselves. Stated briefly, it was probably agreed at Brussels, according to the estimates to which I have referred, that in the 3 years we would add eight divisions to our European forces, while the Western European countries added from 28 to 36. Our ratio of the respective increments would, therefore, be as 1 to 3½ or 1 to 4½. It would seem wise therefore, for a timetable to be prepared under which at stated intervals the Europeans would add three and one-half or four and one-half divisions and we would thus add one. This would prevent our bearing too large a share of the load at any one time. It would also give an incentive for the Europeans to meet their schedules since they would obtain the added protection of an American division for each three and one-half or four and one-half which they put into service; but only when they added three and one-half or four and one-half divisions. If this is not already included in the Brussels agreement, it should quickly be made a part of the compact although, for security reasons, the precise scheduling of these additions of course should not be published.

THE STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE OF WESTERN EUROPE

I have also discussed before this point in my remarks the strategic importance of the European continent to the military defense of the United States. But the area is strategically vital not only to our defense. It is also vital to the war-making potential of any power, be it friend or enemy. Let us consider steel, in terms of world production in 1950. At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert as part of my remarks table IV, showing the estimates of the two trade journals, Iron Age and Steel, for the steel-producing countries of the world.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I see the schedule?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have a feeling that a very clever parliamentary trick is about to be played upon me now. I know that the Senator from North Dakota will not object to the insertion of this table in the text. However, since he does object——

Mr. LANGER. I am not objecting; I am reserving the right to object. I simply wish to see what the Senator wishes to place in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Inasmuch as the Senator from North Dakota reserves the right to object to my inserting the table, I withdraw it.

Mr. LANGER. I am very sorry the Senator does so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope that at a later time the heart of the Senator from North Dakota will be sufficiently melted so that he will permit the table to be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert table IV in its proper place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

TABLE IV.—World production of steel ingots and steel for casting, 1950

[In thousands of net tons]

	Iron Age estimate	Steel estimate
World total	197,154	203,200

Sources: Iron Age, Jan. 4, 1951; Steel, Jan. 1, 1951.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I can say that the figures included in the table, which I hope to be able to place in the RECORD, show that in 1950 the United States produced 96,500,000 tons of steel ingots and steel for casting. Russia and its European satellites produced 34,900,000 tons. Western Europe, including Britain, actually produced 57,700,000 and its capacity was approximately 65,000,000. Moreover, Mr. President, if the United States, Western Europe, Canada, Mexico, Australia, and South Africa but stand together, they control 159,400,000 net tons of steel production, of which 154,000,000 is in the United States and Western Europe.

If, as Mr. Hoover proposes, we desert Western Germany, France, Belgium, Luxemburg and the Saar, we have lost 33,200,000 tons. If we join Mr. Hoover in pulling out of the rest of Europe to the Atlantic, we lose a total of 40,000,000. If Britain falls, as it very possibly will if Europe is lost, there will go another 18,000,000.

I am aware that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] says we could stand on the Rhine with our air power and deny Western Europe's steel to Russia by bombing the Ruhr. I think our national defense would be much better served by standing somewhere east of the Ruhr, in the first place.

I do not see, in the second place, how we can obtain from the Europeans the European and African bases necessary to bomb the Ruhr or anywhere else in Europe after having left them to their own resources in the matter of troops on the ground. Since steel is the strongest material component in our defense and the base of all other industry, we should not lightly give it up to the enemy or accept its destruction at our own hands. We in the free nations need that 65,000,000 tons of steel a year on our side.

THE BRUSSELS AGREEMENT WILL ADVANCE COLLECTIVE SECURITY

Mr. President, I think we are in the familiar position in which men so often find themselves. I hope it is not trite to say that if there were no Brussels agreement, we should have to invent one. That is precisely why I think it so important that the Congress express its approval or disapproval of the main features of that instrument. Always with the proviso that the Europeans continue to help themselves, and at an accelerating rate, the Brussels agreement—more properly the Atlantic Pact behind it—is the most convincing single and immediate pledge of the principle of collective security.

Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not desert me.

Mr. LANGER. I am going to return.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator. It is the principle of collective security which I am really seeking to advance, and that not only in Europe. But the debate was initiated over Europe and over the agreement made at Brussels. General Eisenhower is even now surveying the definite prospects for putting into effect the agreement made or the understandings arrived at by diplomatic officials at Brussels. We must know what the attitude of Congress is toward the principle of collective security in Europe, or the people will not know how to judge the fruits of the Eisenhower mission.

Every argument that comes to my mind convinces me that to reaffirm our common security with that of Europe is vital to our survival as a free nation. There is, Mr. President, poetic justice in the fact that it was the civilization of Europe in turn which helped to teach us the value of freedom. In portraying some of the dangers involved in such a program as this, we should paint not only the sunny side, but also the dangers, which are real.

Let us frankly face the fact that the allied armies which are to be raised under the Brussels agreement may be overpowered and defeated. We may be driven into the sea. Our losses may be heavy. No one can take this possibility lightly. Everyone who cares for human life must consider it. But what Senator TAFT and Mr. Hoover seem to insist upon is that we should not use land troops on the continent unless we are certain to win. Thus Mr. Hoover says that he would not give Europe another man or another dollar until it had erected "A sure dam against the Red flood." Mr. TAFT says he would not agree in advance to use land troops unless we were, quoting his exact words—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 5, page 58—"almost certain of success."

But what these gentlemen overlook is the fact that if we do not help, Europe and Asia will likely fall. It will be a certainty then that we will have to face the Communist world alone. We will then be in the greatest danger of all and our ultimate losses will be even more terrible.

In order to protect ourselves against such a calamity, is it not wise to take some chances in the effort to avert it? If we only try to resist the Communists when it is a sure thing that we will win, the Communists will conquer the world.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, I prefer not to yield just now.

Then the only sure thing will be either the destruction or the vital crippling of America itself. This is not the kind of certainty which Mr. Hoover, Senator TAFT, or any of us desire.

VI. WHAT ABOUT ASIA?

Mr. President, thus far I have attempted to state the case I have against the Taft-Hoover approach to the issue of our proper strategy and to defend the Brussels agreement, or the Brussels understanding, as it has been reported. I disagree, somewhat less exhaustively, with what I have described as the second school of thought on the subject—namely, the "protect Europe but not Asia" school which asks us to restrict our major commitments to Europe. But I nevertheless disagree with it.

Mr. President, it is not because I underestimate the vital importance of Europe that I disagree with those who, like the British, would largely restrict our commitments to that area. I go the whole way with them as to the vital importance of Europe. But on the other side of the world, they do not go the whole way with us. The American defenders of this idea would defend Japan, Formosa, the Ryukyus, the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand, I am sure. But that is about as far as they would go.

However, this school seems to feel that the combined forces of Western Europe and the United States cannot be spread thin and that, even together, we do not have the strength to protect free Asia as well. Asia, according to them, is not industrially developed, and the Communists would not gain too greatly by taking it over.

THE DANGER OF LOSING SOUTHEAST ASIA AND INDIA

With this I firmly disagree. While it is true that Asia is not a greatly developed industrial area, southeast Asia is the major source of at least two very vital war materials, namely, tin and rubber, as well as a vast reservoir of manpower. Its loss would endanger India, which is one of our major sources of manganese.

Indochina is now in grave danger of falling to the Communists. Not only is there a strong internal Communist movement, but a Chinese Communist army is poised at their gates and is ready to strike. If this happens, Burma, Thailand, Malay, and Indonesia will be sitting ducks and will fall very quickly. Ceylon will then be in great danger. India, already facing the Russian Communists from the northwest through a thin strip of Afghanistan, will find herself suddenly faced with terrific pressure from the east in a Communist-held southeast Asia. To the west of India are only the weak, semineutral, feudal countries of Afghanistan, Iran, and Saudi Arabia.

Now vast masses of people in India live a submarginal existence, and India in 1949 imported over three-quarters of a million tons of rice from southeastern Asia—350,000 tons from Thailand and over 400,000 tons from Burma. I am told that India's minimum grain requirements are 6,000,000 tons more than her current crops. She still gets a very important part of her food supply from this area. If the Communists get Indochina, Burma, and Thailand, they hold the "rice bowl" of the Orient. One of their biggest problems at the moment is securing adequate food for their Asiatic fighting forces, so the Communists will be vastly strengthened if they take over southeast Asia.

Meanwhile, India, having great supplies of rice cut off, would be weakened internally. The hunger, disease, and unrest upon which the Communists thrive would flourish. Sitting in the jaws of a nutcracker with Russia as one jaw, a Communist-held southeast Asia as the other jaw, weakened internally by lack of food, facing an enemy greatly strengthened by access to an abundant food supply for its fighting forces, India, whether Prime Minister Nehru recognizes it or not, will surely fall.

With India gone, the countries of the Middle East, lacking our help, or even the threat—as against Communist aggressors—of our help, will also go to the Communists. Then Africa, and so on.

IF WE LOSE SOUTHEAST ASIA, WE LOSE 95 PERCENT OF OUR NATURAL RUBBER

Meanwhile, how does all this affect us? In the first place we would lose practically all of our sources of natural rubber. Malaya, Indonesia, Thailand, Ceylon, and Indochina produced 1,497,000 long tons of natural rubber in the first 11 months of 1950. This is nearly 90 percent of the world total. From this area the United States alone imported 700,000 tons during the same period which accounted for 95 percent of our total rubber supplies.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a table giving the break-down on rubber production and United States imports of rubber.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE V.—Major sources of natural rubber

[Figures are for first 11 months of 1950]

Country	Production (long tons)	United States imports (long tons)
Malaya	628,000	332,000
Indonesia	630,000	194,000
Thailand	100,000	97,000
Ceylon	101,500	59,000
Indochina	38,000	19,000
Total for Southeast Asia	1,497,500	701,000
Other [1]	172,500	35,000
World totals	1,670,000	736,000

Source: Department of Commerce.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Virtually all this natural rubber will be lost. We can use synthetics for passenger automobile tires, but we must have natural rubber for bomber tires, heavy truck tires, and many other uses.

I regret to say that the Munitions Board, in charge of the stockpiling, lagged woefully behind in their acquisitions of rubber as has been reported by Senator JOHNSON'S preparedness subcommittee—Senate Document 230, page 18. I desire to pay tribute to the junior Senator from Texas for the magnificent work he has done in showing the inadequacy of the efforts of the Munitions Board and the defense officials in accumulating a sufficient stockpile of strategic raw materials. This, despite the fact that Congress had made adequate appropriations for stockpiling purposes.

We can exist for some time, perhaps, on what we have by severe curtailment of rubber for civilian uses. We did so during World War II. But if we follow the Taft-Hoover program, or even the "protect Europe but not Asia" school of thought on foreign policy and abandon Asia, we shall be at a terrific disadvantage if war comes, especially if the war is a long one, which it very likely will be if the Communists control all of Asia.

LOSS OF SOUTHEAST ASIA WOULD CAUSE US TO LOSE TWO-THIRDS OF OUR TIN SUPPLY

We would also find ourselves virtually hamstrung with respect to tin. Asia accounts for nearly two-thirds of the world production of tin-content ore, or 99,000 metric tons out of a world total of 162,000 metric tons. Of this 99,000 tons, China, which is already lost, accounts for only 4,000 tons. Ninety-five thousand tons come from Southeast Asia which is the immediate danger spot. This is made up as follows:

TABLE VI—Sources of tin content ore in Southeast Asia

	Metric tons
Malaya	55,000
Indonesia	30,000
Thailand	8,000
Burma	2,000
Total	95,000

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I regret to say to my dear friend——

Mr. LANGER. On the question of tin, I want to show where much of the tin is. It is in South America.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator will wait a minute; after completing one sentence, I will yield.

Another 23,000 tons comes from Nigeria and the Belgian Congo, both in Africa, which will be in danger if all of Asia falls. Our only worthwhile source of supply which will be left if we lose southeast Asia is Bolivia with only 34,000 tons. And even in peacetime, the United States alone consumes 60,000 tons annually.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is only because I am so fond of the Senator that against my better judgment and against my best interests, I yield for one brief question.

Mr. LANGER. With reference to the purchase of tin, is it not true that we have spent billions of dollars all over the world and that the Democratic administration has not developed tin in South America, where the supply is greater than in any other area in the world?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is this a rhetorical statement?

Mr. LANGER. It is a question. Is it not true?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not know how much money has been spent for developing tin in South America. I might say that such a program could very well have taken place under the Point 4 program which more Republicans than Democrats opposed. However, this question of foreign policy seems to me to be far too grave to make into a partisan issue. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will join me in an endeavor to keep this from happening.

Again I regret to say that the Munitions Board allowed themselves to fall behind, in this case, in the stockpiling of tin. Mr. Hubert Howard, former chairman of the Munitions Board, reported that, as of December 31, 1949, there were stocked 60,713 long tons of tin, including 22,500 tons held by the RFC which is permitted to sell its holdings to industry—reported in Armed Force, May 13, 1950. This left a net frozen tonnage as of that date of only 38,000 long tons for strategic use against a background of an essential civilian and military demand under peacetime conditions of 60,000 tons annually. This should give us some idea of how far behind we are so far as stockpiling is concerned.

Of course we can severely curtail civilian goods which use tin as we did in World War II. But how long can we fight a war without more tin? Five years, perhaps. But what if the war lasts 10 years or even longer? Can we afford to take that chance by allowing southeast Asia to fall to the Communists?

THE DANGER OF LOSING MANPOWER AND STRATEGIC MATERIALS

We used to get a large portion of our manganese requirements from Russia. Russia has largely cut this off, and we are getting 552,000 metric tons of manganese annually from India. But if we do nothing India will go to the Communists, so we will have lost that. We also get 655,000 tons from the Union of South Africa and 331,000 tons from the Gold Coast in Africa. But these supplies are not safe, either. It takes 14 pounds of manganese for every ton of steel. Can we afford to let this vital ingredient to the heart of our war-making defense capacity go by the Boards? I do not think so.

Then, if we lose Southeast Asia and India we will very likely lose the Middle East. This region has vast reserves of precious oil. Oil is the lifeblood of modern armed forces, and losing these reserves would weaken us and give great strength to the Communists.

Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota does not object, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks table VII, which will give an idea of what we would lose in oil reserves if we should lose the Middle East.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE VII.—Estimated petroleum reserves—Major producing areas, as of Jan. 1, 1950

Area and country	Estimated reserves	Percent world reserves
	Barrels
U. S. S. R. and satellites	4,800,000,000	6.24
Europe (outside the iron curtain)	209,950,000	.27
Far East	1,570,000,000	1.99
Middle East and Africa	33,115,500,000	42.31
South America	10,548,000,000	13.47
North America	27,961,800,000	35.72
Total world reserves	78,280,250,000	100.00

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, as we can see by this table, the Middle East has 42⅓ percent of the world oil reserves. Russia and her satellites already have 6¼ percent so, if the Communists take over the Middle East, they will control nearly one-half of the world's oil reserves. We cannot afford to let this happen.

There are other strategic materials to consider. I am no expert in geopolitics, but when I consider what we lose in terms of manpower and vital materials—not to mention the destruction of cultures and of nations and of freedom—by letting the Communists take all of Asia, frankly I am alarmed. I simply do not think we can take the chance.

While we would be denied access to these materials and manpower, Russia would be integrating them and strengthening herself.

The problem is not one merely of economic survival. The problem is one of political survival—the survival of freedom. And if we are to survive, we need the people and the war-making materials of that part of Asia which is still free. If protecting free Asia as well as Europe would spread our forces too thin, then by all means let us build up our joint forces so that they will be sufficient. Let us not allow our weakness to dominate our policy. Let us instead develop adequate strength to support a policy which is wise. That means trying to prevent the Communists from taking over Asia and keeping it instead in the hands of free native governments.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I think all parties to this debate agree that the islands of Japan should be not only defended with the aid of American forces, but should be rearmed in the common effort against Communist aggression. I should like to inquire how the 80,000,000 people of Japan can successfully live, to say nothing of maintaining large armed forces, unless there is at least part of a friendly Asia which is left open to Japanese trade. The policy of surrendering Asia but defending Japan would require vast permanent subsidies from the United States going far beyond the military assistance program to which we are committed. I do not say that we may not be forced to embrace such a policy, or that our occupation policy has not already embraced it in part. I do say that we should strive to prevent the conditions which would force such a policy upon us.

TO PROTECT SOUTHEAST ASIA, WE NEED NOT GET BOGGED DOWN IN A LAND WAR WITH RED CHINA

Mr. President, our military capacities and the strategic position we now confront will, of course, not permit us to deploy huge land armies on the continent of Asia. We can use air and sea power in the defense of most of Southeast Asia. With adequate help from other nations, we can also use some land forces in the defense of all Southeast Asia, Japan, the Philippines, Australia, and India. Our Navy can both help defend Formosa, as it is now doing, and blockade the Chinese ports.

In committing ourselves to aid in the defense of Europe, Mr. President, we should not adopt a policy of totally neglecting the importance of the continent of Asia. That is the point at which I disagree with what I have called the second group debating the means of our defense, those who would largely restrict our efforts to Europe. That is also the point, Mr. President, at which I would like to suggest to our British friends that they should not become European isolationists while deploring the views of those in America who are isolationists toward Europe. In fact, it is their isolationism toward Asia which directly helps to strengthen American isolationism toward Europe. If they would only help us more in Asia, it would become more possible for us to help them more in Europe.

If there is one message which the English now in this city can carry back to their country, it is this: How can they ask us to defend them in Europe if they do not make their contributions to the defense of Asia?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I cannot yield at this time.

Russian domination of the Eurasian land mass, Mr. President, would leave us no place to base the air and sea defense of the Belgian Congo, the Gold Coast, or any other vital spot in Africa, including Suez. We should lose valuable resources of uranium, cobalt, and other materials. To the loss of India's half a million metric tons of manganese, we would have to add the loss of 655,000 tons from the Union of South Africa and 331,000 tons from the Gold Coast. How the Senator from Ohio thinks we can defend Africa once we have lost Europe and probably Asia as well is beyond me. Frankly, I think Africa would be almost impossible to hold if we lost all of Asia and the Middle East, even if we did manage to hold Europe itself.

VII. WHAT WOULD BE THE FATE OF AMERICA IN A COMMUNIST-CONTROLLED WORLD?

Mr. President, I have tried to demonstrate that we must adopt a foreign policy of resisting Russian aggression everywhere we can. We must adopt this policy for our own security as well as for that of the other free and independent nations of the world. I should like to emphasize, however, that we are not the only ones who should take this stand. Every nation with a stake in freedom and independence should do the same. Is it not apparent that unless we help, the Communists could now sweep over all of Europe, Asia, the Middle East, and Africa? Since this might be done, and I believe it is possible, our answer should not be a quavering retreat and abandonment of our allies. The answer, Mr. President, lies in building up our combined strength to meet this challenge.

For, Mr. President, what would happen if the Communists came to dominate the rest of the world? Can we believe that the Communists, with their record of aggression would sit still indefinitely? Of course not.

Our weakness and abandonment of allies would provide the Russians with an engraved invitation to take over the world except for us. In view of the Communist doctrine that they will not be safe until the whole world is Communist, it is inevitable that they would move. And they would immediately take over what Sir Halford Mackinder has called the World Island, all of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

What kind of a world would we live in then, Mr. President?

In the first place, we would be alone with our major allies gone. We would be sitting in the jaws of the greatest military nutcracker ever to exist in the history of the world; between a Communist Asia on the one hand and a Communist Europe and Africa on the other.

The loss of Europe, Asia, and Africa would bring an irresistible drive toward isolationism in the United States and the consequent erection of a garrison state. The effort to build an unconquerable bastion while surrounded by a Communist world would bring in its train the suppression of many of our precious liberties. We probably could not avoid the realities of the police state, however we might avoid the name.

COMMUNISTS' RESOURCES WOULD BE OVERWHELMING

As I have pointed out, we would be cut off from extremely important strategic materials. We would have lost two-thirds of our source of tin, virtually all of our sources of rubber and manganese, and vast quantities of oil. The Communists would have steel resources equal to ours. Our capacity to defend ourselves would be so weakened that we would be at a great disadvantage. Communists would have their own productive might combined with that of Europe and Japan. They would have a virtual monopoly of many strategic materials which they would deny to us and use against us. Their supply of manpower for their armed forces and productive capacity would be limitless. Let us look at this manpower situation for a moment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point in my remarks to insert table VIII, which shows how the manpower of the non-Communist world will deteriorate as the Communists take over the various countries.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TABLE VIII.—The location of the world's population and how it will be changed if the Communists gradually take over selected areas

[All figures in millions. Figures rounded and do not add up to totals]

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I prefer not to yield. I shall be glad to have a private conversation with the Senator after I have concluded.

Table VIII shows that the present division of the world's population is 750 million under Communist control and 1.6 billion in non-Communist countries. So the present ratio is better than 2 to 1 in our favor. But if we lose Western Europe the division will be nearly 1 billion Communist to 1.4 billion non-Communist, so the ratio in our favor will drop to less than 1½ to 1. Then if we lose the United Kingdom, we lose another 46 million which will be picked up by the Communists.

The ratio will shift to favor the Communists if we then lost Southeast Asia with the Communists controlling countries with a combined population of 1.2 billion, while the non-Communist will have only 1.16 billion. If we then lose India, the Communist ratio will jump to nearly 2½ to 1.

After this, if the Communists take over the Middle East, Africa and the rest of the Far East, they will control the whole World Island of Asia, Africa and Europe along with peripheral areas such as Japan and England. If they control Europe, Asia and Africa, they will hold control of 2,036,500,000 people while we in the free nations will have only 314,300,000. Russia would outnumber us almost 7 to 1.

RUSSIA MIGHT CONQUER US AND RULE THE WORLD

Were this manpower combined with the productive capacity and strategic materials of Europe, Asia, and Africa, it would be extremely difficult for us to survive. I do not say it would be impossible. I merely say it would be difficult to survive. War would finally come to us on our own soil when we would be stripped of allies by our abandoning them. Russia might well take us over and rule the world.

It is this picture, Mr. President, which causes me to reject both the Taft-Hoover approach and the program of those who would restrict our efforts almost wholly to Europe. I believe we should strive to marshal as many people and countries as possible to resist Russian aggression, and, to the extent of our resources, help them to resist if they will help themselves.

VIII. WHAT SHOULD WE DO AT HOME?

Mr. President, we heard the President of the United States repeat on January 8 that the Government's immediate goal is a mobilization of 3,500,000 men, with the maintenance of further sources of manpower in the National Guard and Reserves. By the testimony of General Marshall and Mrs. Rosenberg 2 days later, it appeared then that the target for July 1 of this year is 3,200,000 men under arms.

That figure has since been raised to about three and one-half million men. This would be at the rate of approximately 23 men under arms per 1,000 population. Presumably, our industrial mobilization is being geared to equip 3,500,000 men under arms some time in the summer of 1951, to carry out an increased program of military aid to our allies, and to build the added plant capacity which would be necessary in a general war. The President, for example, tells us that such capacity, when constructed, would be adequate to produce 50,000 planes and 35,000 tanks a year, if that became necessary.

THREE AND ONE-HALF MILLION MEN NOT ENOUGH

I believe that the final target of 3,500,000 men under arms within 8 to 9 months is too low, and that the timetable for reaching it is too slow. We need not only to raise our goals, but to speed up the process of reaching them. I do not know the assumptions about the world crisis on which our military leaders have erected their target of 3,500,000 men. They are, however, obviously not the assumptions to which I have been addressing myself in these remarks.

My assumptions, moreover, were clearly not those held by the North Atlantic ministers at the Brussels Conference. According to press reports, it was agreed there that the joint defense force on the European Continent should be built up to an estimated total of 55 divisions of which we were to furnish 10, by the end of 1953. Does this assume that the Russian danger will not really come upon us until 1954, and that we have therefore 3 years in which to get ready? I can see no basis for any such assumption. Indeed, in view of what is happening in Korea today, and was happening there when the Brussels Conference met, this idea seems not so much an assumption as a delusion. We cannot safely operate on the assumption that the Russians will not move in 1953, in 1952, or even in the next 6 months.

WE HAVE ONLY SEEN THE FIN OF THE SHARK

Mr. President, the manifestation of Communist aggression in Korea during these last 6 months is but the showing of the fin of the shark above the water. It is but a fraction of the striking power of the man-eater which lies beneath the surface. Day before yesterday, it was Czechoslovakia; yesterday it was China; today it is Korea. What will it be tomorrow?

WHERE WILL THE COMMUNISTS STRIKE NEXT?

I would say to my British friends that Hong Kong lies deep within the very jaws of Communist China. They may close at any moment. And when they do and that profitable colony is swallowed, I wonder if the British diplomats will still look as kindly upon the Chinese Reds as they do now. When Hong Kong falls I wonder if the British foreign office will still refuse to brand the Chinese Communists as aggressors, whether they will work to place them on the Security Council, even though this would reward successful aggression with a seat on the Council which was designed to prevent aggression. I doubt it. And perhaps the British diplomats need just such a jolt as this to bring them to their senses, although I, for one, shall be sorry to see the occasion for it occur.

Perhaps it will be Indochina, on whose borders a Communist army now rests. It may be Iran, where a Russian move would have overwhelming tactical advantages.

It may be free Berlin, which is deep within Communist East Germany, and which latest reports indicate may even now be facing another cruel blockade. It may be a surge westward into free Germany by East German Communists, just as the North Korean Communists moved southward last June. It may be that Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary will attack Yugoslavia. It may even be an attack by airborne Russian divisions across the narrow Bering straits into the vast and empty spaces of Alaska, there to establish air bases from which the continental United States could be attacked.

These are no chimeras, Mr. President. They are not nightmares conjured up to frighten the American people. They are real possibilities. They are consistent with expressed Communist intentions, with the actions of the Communists since 1945, and with the realities of military power.

Mr. President, the bell is tolling in Korea. It is tolling for the British in Hong Kong, Malaya, and Singapore, even though the British may not know it. The bell is tolling for India, even though Nehru may not know it. The bell is tolling, and the people of Asia and of Europe should listen to its warning. The bell is tolling not merely for the people who are being attacked in Korea, but it is tolling for free men everywhere. To me the danger is real.

(At this point Mr. DOUGLAS yielded to Mr. MCCARRAN and other Senators and debate ensued as to the order of speakers, which, on request of Mr. DOUGLAS and by unanimous consent, was ordered to be printed at the conclusion of the speech of Mr. DOUGLAS.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I do not think I am an alarmist and certainly I do not want to be one. And I have no access to military intelligence reports. But the danger to me is real and present. I believe our security and that of the world itself is at stake. The disparity is too great between our military strength with a present total of not more than 16 to 18 divisions, as compared with Russia's 175, her satellites with their 60 divisions, and the Chinese Communists with probably at least 125 more. I think we do not have a moment to lose.

WE NEED AT LEAST 6,000,000 MEN UNDER ARMS BY DECEMBER 1

Mr. President, I suggest that we should have 6,000,000 men under arms by next December 1, and that we should have 4,250,000 of this number under arms by the 1st of July. This is approximately three-fourths of a million more than the President's most recent plan calls for by July and two and a half million more than his schedule by the time snow flies next winter. To do this, we should take men into the service at an average rate of approximately 340,000 a month, or nearly the top rate reached in World War II, but with a somewhat lower rate for the first 6 months and a somewhat higher rate for the last four.

On this schedule, by December of this year, when we should have reached the 6,000,000 mark, of which perhaps 4,000,000 will be in the ground forces, we should have activated approximately 55 combat divisions, though we cannot do that if the armed services cling to their present wasteful ratio of overhead to combat troops.

Mr. President, the armed services waste manpower more than any other group in this country. They are top heavy with supply troops and administrative troops. They get the smallest amount of fire power per 100,000 men of any army in the world, for only about 23 percent of the army consists of combat troops. There is great need for our Army to improve its position and to cut down the wasteful overhead. If it does not do so, it will not be making the full contribution to this country which I know it wants to make.

Some of these units should be National Guard divisions which are already in a fair state of readiness; some should be formed from men who have recently finished their basic training, stiffened up by cadres of experienced soldiers, while I hope that at least five would be Marine divisions. Despite the opposition of the general staff of the Army, the Marine Corps has earned by its record the right to exist as a combat organization. The Army is trying to prevent the Marine Corps from being a combat organization, and trying to prevent the Marine Corps from growing. At the same time it is providing for a vast expansion in the Army. I repeat, I believe that the Marine Corps has earned by its record the right to exist as a combat organization.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it not true that only about 22,000 out of each 100,000 in our Army are combat troops?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I believe that is true; and I think, in that 22,000, the headquarters units inside a division are regarded as combat troops. In other words, the overhead inside a division is counted as combat troops, although we know that in practice that frequently is not true.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it not estimated that the Chinese have about 80,000 out of 100,000 as combat troops?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that is true. The Army must change its policy, and I hope the Armed Services Committee rides herd on the General Staff to see that they diminish this overhead.

But, it is not only necessary to assemble men and to form divisions. It is also necessary to equip them. Here also the responsible administrative and military authorities give every evidence of having been dilatory, even in working toward the goal of 3,500,000 men, or before that, of 2,700,000. Congress has appropriated enormous sums for military purposes. Last September we passed a supplementary appropriation bill of $17,000,000,000 for rearmament over and above the large sums provided for 1950–51 in the general appropriation bill. In December we added a further twenty billions. What use has been made of these moneys, Mr. President?

The official statistics of the Government tell a surprising story. According to the daily Treasury statement for January 3, total expenditures of the Department of Defense for the 6 months up to January 2, 1951, were seven billion nine hundred million as compared to seven billion two hundren million during the comparable period of the year before. This was an increase of only seven hundred millions, or 9 percent in the expenditures of the Department of Defense. Yet the military situation is certainly more than 9 percent more serious than it was a year ago. It is, indeed, several times as serious.

After making full allowances for the fact that expenditures actually made do not include contracts let for which payments have not yet been made, it nevertheless seems clear that we have been dragging our feet in the provision of matériel as well as in the assembling of men.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would prefer not to. I shall finish very shortly, and when I finish the Senator can ask any question he wishes.

Mr. WHERRY. My proposed question deals with the subject the Senator is discussing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand, but when I have concluded, the Senator can ask the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Moreover, we see little tangible evidence in industry as yet of any real transference from civilian to defense orders.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST A 6,000,000-MAN FORCE REFUTED

I want to emphasize, Mr. President, that I realize the basic differences between an assumption of our international position that would lead to an armed force of 3,500,000 and one which would lead to a force of 6,000,000. And before passing a verdict, let us consider what rejoinders could be offered to the charge of undue delay which I have made.

First, may I say that some of the arguments for a slow rate of rearmament are mutually contradictory. Thus, it is argued that we cannot induct troops more rapidly because we do not have enough facilities to equip and train them, while it is sometimes said that we do not need to order more equipment because we do not have the troops ready to use it. These two arguments, when advanced separately, may appear strong, but when taken together they are obviously self-defeating.

The new argument, the new defense of this position, I understand, is that we do not have enough shipping. Yet, certainly, at the end of the last war the seas abounded with ships which were under the control of the Government.

The plain answer is that we should speed up both the training of men and the provision of equipment, and that if we do the first, the military will then be forced to do the latter, namely, provide the equipment for the men. It is not necessary for training camps to be equipped with officers' clubs, swimming pools, golf courses, post exchanges, and steam heat before troops can be moved into them. It is better to train our young men now, than to wait until we can afford them the comforts of middle-class homes, particularly in view of the fact that the whole world may meanwhile catch on fire. There are many unused army camps in the South and Southwest where troops can be trained this winter and spring, even though a considerable proportion may have to live under tents. And if this appears to be too rigorous—and there are complaints from constituents about it—it is well for us to remember that many of the men in the line in Korea do not even have tents.

So far as weapons are concerned, there should be no shortage of rifles and carbines in view of the enormous numbers which were used during the last war. If there are still not enough to go around, it should be remembered that a considerable part of basic military training—close-order drill, extended order, physical conditioning, military discipline—can be carried through without rifles. If we use speed, the needed weapons could certainly be ready by the time the men were assigned to their service schools and rifle companies and then later formed into divisions.

Mr. President, it is better to do needed acts imperfectly than not to do them because we may not have facilities to do them perfectly. That is the inner meaning of the malapropism, "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing badly." Discomforts and difficulties should not be allowed to stand in the way of training a large number of our men. We may be in the process of subjecting 18-year-olds to universal training of some kind, but whatever kind it proves to be, it will not be peacetime training, for there is no peace.

WILL A 6,000,000-MAN FORCE COST TOO MUCH?

A second objection to such an increase in our rearmament goals is that it will cost too much, or more than we want it to cost. That is why the Senator from Ohio objected to a force of 4,500,000 or 3,500,000 men.

There is no doubt that the costs will be high. I estimate a probable average cost of $10,000 per man per annum. To equip and support a force of 6,000,000 men will cost approximately $60,000,000,000 a year or $46,000,000,000 more than the direct military costs for the year 1949–50. This is on the basis of an average of $10,000 per man per year. This is the best estimate I can make based on World War II costs and the increase in prices since then. Senator TAFT's figure seems to be an average of $13,000 per man per year. Since we will be fortunate if we can reduce nonmilitary cost by six billions to a total of twenty billions, this would mean total national expenditures of at least eighty billions of dollars, or approximately 32 percent of the net national income of 250 billions of dollars. I am using the more conservative figure of net national income rather than that for gross national product, which probably amounts to between two hundred and ninety and three hundred billions. I am doing this because the figure for gross national product, first, includes transfer payments such as interest on the public debt and allowances to veterans which do not add to the real flow of goods and services; second, apparently includes payments to men in the armed services; and, third, does not include allowances for the depreciation of buildings, machinery, and equipment. Only after these charges have been met does net income, properly speaking, begin.

When some twenty-two billions which are spent by State and local governments for such services as schools, roads, fire, and police protection, and care of the unfortunate are added to a Federal budget of $80,000,000,000, we reach a total of slightly above one hundred billions to be spent by Government. That is about 40 percent of the net national income.

This would be a severe and, in many ways, a frightening burden. It would certainly require a reduction in the general standard of living, and I think business labor, agriculture, and the consumer should all be warned that such a reduction is probably coming. Unless Congress and the country met the challenge effectively by taxing, such a diversion of our national income to defense would also lead to borrowing from banks, to the creation of check-book money, and hence to inflation with all its hardships and injustices.

THE PROBLEM OF POPULAR OPINION

These admitted facts have led to a new argument on the part of those who oppose stepping up the rate of American mobilization in the crisis. In Russia, it is said, people cannot object to a heavy military program since, living under a dictatorship as they do, they find their wishes ineffective. But in a democracy such as ours, the desires of the people will ultimately be followed. If a political party is bold enough to impose a heavy burden which is not immediately needed, it is argued that this party will soon be swept from power and another group pledged to a milder policy of armament will soon take office in its stead. Neither the Government nor the people—it is said—would be able to stay the course, and ultimately we would be forced back upon a much lower level of armament.

Therefore, it is argued by our military leaders we should not overstrain the economic and spiritual resources of our people, but rather should fix our pace at a rate which can be maintained both in terms of manpower and in terms of expense. If war actually were to come, or immediately threaten, it would then be easier for us—so it is said—to increase our forces above the 3,500,000 mark, than it would be if we had once been more intensively armed and then had been compelled by public opinion to fall back.

Such an argument is indeed weighty and deserves to be carefully considered. It rests, however, on the basic assumption that the Russian Communists will not start a war for several years, and that we should prepare for a long, slow pull rather than for sudden danger. It is of course possible that this may be so. But it is extremely dangerous to assume that it is.

The State Department has gone for some time on the theory that Russia would not be ready for war for some years. Events in Korea have certainly shaken this assumption. The fact that Russia gave the signal to its satellites for open aggression would seem to indicate that Russia is willing to risk general war and that Russia will strike again unless we speedily rearm. For we must face the fact that our efforts in Korea, which I believe to have been thoroughly justified, have nevertheless depleted our reserve strength to an alarming degree. Most of our combat troops have been committed in Korea, and the margin left to resist elsewhere has been cut to a relatively small figure.

CAN WE MEET THE CHALLENGE?

In World War II it took from 18 to 24 months to get a division ready for combat. We cannot begin to start too quickly. The danger is that we shall be too slow, and if the blow should fall, many of the consequent losses would be irretrievable. It will not do for us to say then that we would have been ready had the Russians only postponed their attack for another 2 or 3 years!

The generals of the Pentagon, like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], seem to be obsessed by the fear of what would happen if the Communists were not to attack. If we have a large army, they say, and Russia does not take the aggressive, then our forces would be all dressed up but would have no place to go. The morale of the troops, says the Senator from Ohio, will suffer as it did before Pearl Harbor. But I will confess I am more worried by another query. Suppose we slowly build up an army of only 3,500,000 men and the Russians do attack? What would happen then? I submit that the results would be far more harmful to us in this case than if we were to have some idle divisions. Would it not be better to be caught long rather than to be caught short?

As for the ability of the American spirit to stand the burden of such heavy armament—if that is, indeed, to be our necessary choice—I do not believe we should underestimate either the priceless worth of liberty or the American willingness to sacrifice in its pursuit. If there has been any reluctance to date, has it not proceeded in large part from the fact that the dangers we all have felt about us have not been fully explained, that no stirring call to action in the face of those dangers has been sounded, and that the trumpet has not given a clear sound? I have faith that if the issues can be presented to to the people of this country they will resist all temptations to give up our security for greater ease and comfort.

This is not blind faith. It is borne out by our record in the past, and there is no reason to suppose that the American character has weakened. If the Russians make such a supposition, they do so at their peril.

THE MATERIAL SACRIFICES WE MUST MAKE

Mr. President, while we should recognize the reality of the material sacrifices which we must make, we should not, in my opinion, overestimate them. The program proposed calls, as I have said, for an added military expenditure of $45,000,000,000 above 1949–50 expenditures, and for 4,500,000 more men than we had under arms then, and for 3,500,000 more than we now have. The added burden of $45,000,000,000 is approximately one-sixth of our national income. While this burden is heavy, it can be borne. This is shown by the following facts:

An increase by 10 percent in the average length of the working week from 40 to 44 hours should increase national output by about 7½ percent, or approximately $19,000,000,000. This would be two-fifths of the added costs which I have outlined. A raising of the work week to 48 hours should send up output by about 15 percent, or by nearly the extra amount needed.

Let us assume that half of the added costs were borne by an increase in hours worked and in output, and half by a reduction in the standard of living, or a cut of about 8 percent. Since the average real income per capita is now about 40 percent higher than it was in 1929 (i. e., or 140, relative to 1929's 100), this would mean a reduction of between 11 and 12 points. This would still leave average real income per person close to 30 percent above what it was in 1929. And it is worth remembering that the 1929 level was thought only 20 years ago to be an almost idyllic high-water mark.

Furthermore, if war does not come, we can maintain a 6,000,000-man force and still ultimately cut back our losses in living standards by increasing productive efficiency. Meanwhile, we would be much better prepared. The task is not too difficult, therefore, if we have the will to survive, but it requires a clear realization of the dangers, and a determined readiness to prevent them.

A program of rearmament of this nature does call for heavy sacrifices; that fact should not be overlooked. But the gains in security, freedom, and in justice will outweigh them.

IX. WHAT WE SHOULD IMMEDIATELY DO ABROAD

Hitherto, I have discussed in general terms the need for us to resist Communist aggression wherever it occurs, provided that the area in question is accessible and that other countries join us in adequate strength. I have emphasized that this principle should apply to Asia as well as to Europe. I have tried to argue that we should do this, not in order to be international busy-bodies, nor to waste our blood and resources abroad, but because our own safety depends upon keeping Western Europe and as much of Asia as possible non-Communist. It is now time to narrow our sights and to try to indicate what are some of the more immediate steps which should be taken to carry out such a general decision.

When one does this, he should do it with due humility, and without the slightest touch of cockiness. None of us knows all the answers. All of us make mistakes. The decisions are grave, involving as they do, the fortunes and the very lives of hundreds of millions of people. With a due sense of the errors of the human mind, and the errors of my own mind, in particular, I should like to suggest the following:

First. Approve the principles of the Brussels agreement by congressional action, subject to a time-table under which each division of American troops sent abroad must be matched by a given number of European divisions, in a ratio of either 3½ to 1 or 4½ to 1, and speed up the terminal date at which we reach the maximum strength, so that it will not be the end of 1953 or even the end of 1952, but, if possible, the middle of 1952.

Second. Continue to urge the United Nations to recognize the plain fact that Red China has committed aggression, and work for a blockade of the Chinese coast. If the other nations refuse to act, frankly recognize that the United Nations has failed as an instrument to resist aggression, as the League of Nations failed over Manchuria and Ethiopia in the 1930's. In this event, while still keeping the United Nations as a forum, place no reliance on it as a source of immediate protection and build up our security, instead, through alliances or union alongside or outside of it. I regret that this seems to be necessary, but it is Russia's fault and not ours. In any event, prevent aggression from being rewarded, and hence do not permit Red China to be seated as a member of the United Nations. Let us use the veto to prevent this should it become necessary.

Institute a naval blockade of China to shut off supplies and force China to deplete Russia's resources. Bomb isolated Chinese supply dumps and power plants in Korea, although not the civilian population. Mr. President, I do not wish to see the civilian population of China bombed, because if we were to do so and if we killed large numbers of Chinese people, that would not only cause tremendous hardship to the individuals, but it would be likely to inflame all of Asia against us, and the Russians would try to turn the war into a race war of the yellow man against the white, which we must not permit to happen. For the struggle is not that, Mr. President, but a common effort of men of all colors to resist the aggression of the Communist states so that all may develop freely.

Third. Make no deal in Korea in order to get out. Try to resist as long as possible. If we leave, let it be an honorable withdrawal under gunfire because of overwhelming odds. To withdraw otherwise would shake the confidence of non-Communists and anti-Communists everywhere, and would enormously strengthen the forces of communism.

Fourth. Try to promote democracy, land reform, and an increase in production and living standards in all non-Communist countries, especially those threatened by Communist aggression. Do this not only for itself, but also so that the poor of these countries have something more to defend than is now the case, and hence may oppose communism more vigorously. Let us do this especially on the Malay Peninsula, in India, where I hope we give or sell supplies of food, to the Middle East, and, yes, in Italy itself.

Let us range ourselves, not as white imperialists trying to take over those countries, but as a body of nations trying to resist aggression, so that the new nationalisms which are developing in Asia—the new nationalisms which at this time are trying to develop the freedoms we developed in the American Revolution—may come to fruition and may extend the benefits of a fuller life to all their people and so that they may have a chance to be free from the imperialism of Soviet Russia and of Communist China.

Fifth. Be ready to help with naval and air power if the Communists strike in Indochina, the Malay Peninsula, or the Near East. Get Great Britain and France to make the preponderant contributions to the necessary land forces in order to compensate for their relative failure to help in the Korean struggle.

Sixth. Try to get as good allies as we can, but have no squeamishness from now on about taking associates whose records may be somewhat soiled. Our civilization has the right to survive. It is infinitely superior to that of Russian communism. If we wait until we have perfect allies, we shall be very lonely.

No one who sits as a spectator on the sidelines has the right to complain if we, battling for our survival and for the survival of the free world, of necessity take imperfect allies who are willing to help. Therefore, let us try to bring Franco, Tito, and Chiang Kai-shek in on our side. They are not democrats, but they are anti-Communists. While they do not stand for freedom themselves, in resisting totalitarian communism they will be helping to protect our freedom. Try to help the constructive forces in Chiang Kai-shek's administration, and use his and our resources for a common end.

These leaders have at least one and one-half million troops available. These can be very helpful in checking the aggressive onrush of the police state. Their sins can be forgiven, and they can stand beside us in the battle. If spectators complain that we are not associating with the best people, let us remind them that the struggle is for survival, and that a defeat because of failure to use available non-Communist forces may not be as virtuous as they assume. Moreover, those who sit in the icy seats of the scornful and decline to take part in the struggle, when freedom is at stake, may not be so virtuous as they assume. Let them remember that we took Joe Stalin as an ally in the last war, and that these men, to put it mildly, cannot be worse than he.

Take pains to make the reasons for this action plain to the working people of Great Britain, France, and the West and to the free people in the East, and make it clear that in accepting the aid of dictators we do not subscribe to their antidemocratic ideas but instead are actively promoting the democratic faith. We may not support their form of government, I certainly do not support their form of government, but we do support their stand against communism and we will join them in resisting Communist aggression wholeheartedly.

Seventh. Serve notice upon Russia and the world that the next act of aggression by a Communist satellite will be regarded by us as an aggressive move by Russia which will be punished by us to the full extent of our power. We have been extraordinarily forebearing with the Russians as the recital of the last five and one-half years of history has indicated. We have treated the invasion of South Korea by the North Korean Communists and the aggressive war started in Korea by the Chinese Communists as isolated and independent acts. We know, however, that both of these aggressions were started at Russian prompting and have proceeded under Russian dictation.

The Russians would like to bleed us white by a series of such moves by satellites for which they will then deny responsibility. If we and the rest of the world allow ourselves to be sucked in by this, it will be fatal. Instead of fighting off only the tentacles of the octopus, let us recognize that these tentacles are directed by a central intelligence. Let us serve notice, therefore, that at the next act of aggression by a satellite, we will reserve the right to strike at the eye of the octopus itself. This is much more likely to be a deterrent than a stimulant to aggression.

Eighth. Although the hopes for settlement are but slender, keep open the avenues for honorable negotiation, and strive, without let-up in the mobilization of our defenses, for peace without any surrender of freedom or justice.

Ninth. Let us tell the nations of the world our aims and intentions. They are honorable and we should make them known. Modesty is becoming in the case of individuals, but as a nation we must get across our ideas to the peoples of the world.

Police states are historically more effective at propaganda than democracies in the short run, although the ideas of democracy have survived over the years because they are superior. But we now face a very grave short run proposition which may very well turn out to be a long-run proposition. We should not preach the "big lie," as do the Communists. We need only preach the truth, but we must preach it well. For we need the people of the world on our side, and we have much more to offer than the Communists.

X. CONCLUSION

Mr. President, let us determine that our civilization is not to fall and that the icecap of the police state shall not descend upon either us or Western culture. If that were to happen, then the liberties which we take for granted, as the air we breathe, would disappear; men could be arrested in the middle of the night without a warrant, taken to stations of the secret police, and kept there without having the right of habeas corpus; they could be sentenced without trial, condemned to death, or condemned to being worked to death in a prison camp. The icecap of tyranny would descend over the world, and with that would go control over the schools, the radio and the churches. Those who hate war and think perhaps that it is not worth while to resist would be submerged and their very children would be taken away from them.

It would be hundreds of years, perhaps many centuries, before that icecap would melt. During that time the western civilization of which we are proud, would largely disappear. Mr. President, I think that is a far worse thing to happen to the world than physical death itself.

Civilizations such as Greece and Rome have fallen in the past, and most profound students of history believe that they fell because men lost faith in themselves and failed to meet new challenges. To Gilbert Murray, the cause of the failure of Greece and Rome was that the Greeks and the Romans lost their nerve. To Dean Inge, the failure of civilizations was caused by "resignation," which he said was "the disease from which civilizations die." Arnold Toynbee, in his recent great work on history, says that civilizations fail because of "insufficient response" to "stimulus"; and the gloomy German, Spengler, had the same version, that civilizations fall because the inner faith of a civilization wears itself out. The Communists believe that this is what will happen to us. They think the stream of history flows with them.

It lies within our power to prove them right or to prove them wrong. If we have faith in the essence of our society, namely, respect for the individual and a deep desire to improve human life, and if we translate such a faith into acts, we will survive. If we do not, we are likely to fall.

We have not sought world leadership. It has been thrust upon us by time and the mysterious workings of history. It would be far more comfortable for us all if it had never come. But it has. We cannot escape it. Whatever we as a nation do, will probably be determining.

By withdrawing, we can allow the police state to take over Europe, Asia, and virtually all of the world. If this happens, we shall be hemmed in, and our own survival will be more doubtful. For such a confession of weakness would be contagious and would prevent the free world from rallying in unity. There would be a general rush of men and countries to save themselves. The result, in my judgment, would be disaster. War of course, would be a certainty.

But if weakness is contagious, so also is courage and determination. If we really resolve to resist aggressive communism, others will rally more fully to the cause and will join with us. We may not get the support of many whom we would like to have on our side. We will get the aid of others whom in calmer times we would not wish to have. But the free world will ultimately group around us. And this non-Communist world, if it will only unite, still holds the preponderance of power. It has over twice the population of the Communist world. It has many times the industrial strength of the Communists. For the moment, it is weak in military strength at its very center. But we can repair this.

Freedom can win if we and all the free peoples are united. Such determined unity can perhaps still deter the aggressors from going further and give us peace. It is confessedly a slim hope, but it is the only hope for peace.

Even if—God forbid—open struggle comes, if we are determined to preserve the faith by which we live, we can rebuild much of the damage done and free ourselves and others from the fear of tyranny. In the words of Lincoln which are as appropriate for this crisis as for that of 90 years ago, "We can nobly win or meanly lose the last, best hope of man on earth." Let us resolve to win. Let us have faith and in that faith let us act.

ORDER OF SPEAKERS IN THE DEBATE

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. DOUGLAS,

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, would the Senator from Illinois yield so that I may have an understanding? I know the Senator from Illinois has not concluded his speech.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am near the end. I shall be glad to yield with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Illinois gained the floor under an understanding between him and myself that he should have the floor. As a result I withdrew my effort to get the floor. I know that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is next on a list of speakers which is before the Presiding Officer. Undoubtedly debate will probably continue until nearly 8 o'clock this evening. I wonder if we could have an understanding that on reconvening tomorrow the Senator from Nevada will be recognized to make an address, with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the present Presiding Officer, to follow.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, no unanimous-consent request has been proposed, as I understand.

Mr. McCARRAN. No; no such request has been made.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield without prejudicing his right to the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am happy to yield provided I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to state that it was my hope at least to make an explanatory statement with reference to my resolution. Earlier in the day, of course, I understood that the organization of the Senate had to be effected. Therefore it was impossible to take up the resolution at that time. I notice that the names of approximately six Senators are on the list of Senators who are to follow the Senator from Nevada. Of course no announcement has been made that we shall have a session tomorrow. I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Nevada would permit the junior Senator from Nebraska to make a brief statement on the resolution he has submitted.

Mr. McCARRAN. I may say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Nevada has been attempting to get the floor since Thursday of last week. I have tried to accommodate other Senators who desired the floor. Finally I again yielded today. Whether I had any right to yield is another question, but I did yield under whatever right I had to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for another inquiry, without losing the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Nevada recalls that I, too, tried to obtain the floor last Thursday.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think that is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I attempted to work out, before the session was over, some understanding under which we might proceed. The majority leader persuaded me to wait until Monday, with the statement that possibly an arrangement could be made at that time.

Mr. President, I always like to accommodate Senators in the orderly procedure of debate. However, I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Nevada would modify his suggestion so as to permit the junior Senator from Nebraska to have at least 45 minutes tomorrow. Then the Senator from Nevada could proceed, followed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR]. I think that request is not unreasonable.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to assist the Senator from Nebraska in every way possible. I have yielded to a number of Senators. My speech will probably require not more than 40 minutes, and then I shall be through with the particular subject I have in mind. So far as yielding to the Senator from Nebraska is concerned, or consenting that he may have the first 45 minutes tomorrow, I certainly would have no objection. However, this situation arises by reason of the practice of farming out time. Such practice has been opposed right along by the Vice President of the United States. When he was majority leader he opposed the farming out of time in advance. But the question has again arisen, and time has been farmed out. There is a list before the Presiding Officer, and time has been farmed out. It is not right. It is not in accordance with the spirit of the rules of this body.

I am not criticizing the Senator from Illinois. He took his chances. He and I were taking our chances earlier in the day. I yielded to him whatever chance I had, because I wanted him to go ahead. What I wanted to do was to make progress. When I went to the desk today to find out why I was not to be recognized, I was told that the Vice President thought I had made my speech on Thursday, which I had not. If he thinks tomorrow that I have made my speech today, I shall be out tomorrow.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has yielded to the Senator from Nevada for an observation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada wish to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, provided the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has an opportunity to make his speech this evening, after the morning hour the Senator from Nebraska shall have 45 minutes on the subject of Senate Resolution No. 8, and that following that the senior Senator from Nevada may have the floor, to be followed by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to know where the junior Senator from Minnesota is to be sandwiched in. I have been waiting for an opportunity to obtain the floor. I thoroughly enjoy the opportunity of listening to my distinguished friend from the great State of Illinois. However, I have a few remarks to make which have something to do with the state of the Union. I shall be compelled to object to the unanimous-consent request unless I hear the name of Mr. HUMPHREY from the State of Minnesota read from the list which has been projected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me with the understanding that he shall not lose the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield with that understanding.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to suggest to my good friend from Minnesota that it is always a matter of great inspiration to me to see him on the floor of the Senate. If he will remain with me tonight, I assure him that I will remain until he finishes his remarks tonight.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the practice of farming out time is leading to the condition with which we are confronted. I knew that I could not be heard for several hours, because the Senator from Illinois would have the floor. He now has the floor. Therefore, I absented myself from the Chamber, as did other Senators. If we had been trying to obtain recognition, we would have been in the Chamber, where we should be, as a matter of fact.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I promise the Senator from Nevada that I shall be present in the Chamber when he makes his speech tomorrow.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Provided I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There is a unanimous-consent request before the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to put in a plug for the competitive system on the floor of the Senate. I am perfectly willing to take my chances of recognition, and to remain here to listen to these remarkable addresses and keep up with the business of the Senate. I am of the mind that the list which reposes on the Presiding Officer's desk provides an easy opportunity for some Senators to return to their offices and catch up with their correspondence. I believe in the rugged life, and in individual enterprise, so I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may propound a question to the acting majority leader?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator yield if he may do so without losing the floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall finish my speech very shortly. I do not wish to seem abrupt to the Senator from Nebraska. I yield, provided he will make his question brief.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator for yielding. The question is very brief. I simply wish to ask the acting majority leader whether he knows if there is to be a session of the Senate tomorrow. I think the answer to that question will help many Senators out of this difficulty.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, as I understand it, it is the intention of the majority leader to have a session of the Senate tomorrow. If I had my way now, the Senate would remain in session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting majority leader has stated that there will be a session of the Senate tomorrow.

Mr. McMAHON. From the size of the list, there seem to be a great many speeches in prospect. We should remain and listen to them.

I wish to associate myself with the views expressed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], that the practice of having a list ought to go out the window. We ought to revert to the practice of being present and being recognized when we have something to say.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I express my gratitude to the Senator from Illinois for yielding to me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask that all this colloquy appear at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the colloquy and remarks referred to will be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois.

After the conclusion of the speech of Mr. DOUGLAS,

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MORSE obtained the floor.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for 30 seconds so that I may make a comment on the speech of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MORSE. I should like to accommodate my good friend from Connecticut, but I know I shall have to disappoint a number of Senators who will want me to yield, and I hope the Senator from Connecticut will accept my apology for not yielding. I have advised the minority leader and other Senators that I shall not yield. I am going to proceed, without interruption, to make this speech. I think it would be most unfair of me to start yielding at this late hour, if for no other reason than that of consideration for the members of the staff of the Senate and for Senators, at this late hour, with a speech of the length of that which I am about to make. I feel that decency and courtesy call upon me to make the speech without yielding for any purpose whatsoever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon declines to yield.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, we are now engaged in the United States in the first round of an historic debate on foreign policy, the outcome of which will have tremendous and far-reaching consequences not only for us in the Western Hemisphere but for the entire world. Some 2 weeks ago the distinguished ex-President of the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover, made a major speech, in which he suggested that this continent should be made a "Gibraltar of western civilization" and that we in the United States should refrain from committing ground forces in the continent of Europe, but instead should rely upon the Air Force and the Navy and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans for our defense against communism.

On January 5 the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] made his first major speech on foreign policy in this session of Congress. In the course of that speech the Senator from Ohio said:

> We must not assume obligations by treaty or otherwise which require any extensive use of American land forces. In the first place, we should be willing to assist with sea and air forces any island nations which desire our help. Among those islands are Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Indonesia, Australia, and New Zealand; on the Atlantic side, Great Britain, of course.

Later on in the speech the Senator from Ohio stated:

> The power of great sea and air forces is not necessarily limited to island nations. The policy I suggest certainly would not abandon to Communist conquest the continental nations. In the first place, we may give economic assistance to many such nations providing they really want that assistance. We can give arms as we are bound to do under the Atlantic Pact, and as we are now doing in Indochina, in Greece, and in Turkey.

Then later he said:

> The greatest question of policy before the country and before this Congress, however, relates to our undertakings in Europe. Under the general principles I have laid down, I would say that we had better commit no American troops to the European Continent at this time.

I desire to repeat that sentence, Mr. President, because it is one on which I shall dwell somewhat later in my speech. The Senator from Ohio said:

> Under the general principles I have laid down, I would say that we had better commit no American troops to the European continent at this time. Some modification is required in that theory because, first, we are now occupying Germany with the obligations growing out of the Second World War, and second, we have made certain promises under the Atlantic Pact, which we are bound to carry out.
> It might be well, first, to consider just what our obligations are under the Atlantic Pact. One thing seems certain. There is no legal obligation to send American land soldiers to Europe.

A careful study of Senator TAFT's January 5 speech, as well as his subsequent speech before the National Press Club, shows that the thinking of the senior Senator from Ohio is still very fluid on the issue of committing American land troops to Europe under the North Atlantic Pact. As one reads parts of his speeches, it would appear that the Senator from Ohio is opposed to any implementation of the North Atlantic Pact with additional American troops; but when one has just about reached that conclusion, then he reads in the speech of January 5 the following comments:

> If these nations really do desire to build up their own arms, and do so with our assistance, which we are obligated to give, and if the time comes when they see the need of and demand a coordinated defense, and if it appears at that time that that defense has a reasonable chance of success, I should not object to committing some limited number of American divisions to work with them in the general spirit of the Atlantic Pact. Such a program, however, never ought to be a key point in our over-all military strategy. And the initiative should be theirs and not ours.

By taking the Senator's speech of January 5 and his speech before the National Press Club and weighing them in their entirety, it would seem to be a fair interpretation that the Senator from Ohio does not favor entering into any agreement, at this time, to commit any additional American troops at this time, as a part of the implementation of the North Atlantic Pact. Rather, the Senator from Ohio seems to favor a reliance primarily upon our Air Force and Navy for the protection of our security at home.

He also seems to rely upon the bombing power of our Air Force for crippling or destroying the striking power of a Russian Army if it seeks to occupy Western Europe. However, here again one cannot be exactly sure just what are the proposals of military strategy of the Senator from Ohio, because the conclusions in his two speeches do not seem to have jelled into any consistent set of foreign policy principles. The speeches contain paragraphs which seem to be on again, off again in regard to the North Atlantic Pact or any obligations we in the United States may have to help implement it with some additional military manpower.

Likewise, the two speeches seem to leave the distinguished Senator from Ohio suspended or fluttering in midair, not quite certain whether he will light on the perch of preparation for a land war in Europe, because of the possibility of Russia taking Europe by force if the Atlantic Pact is not strong enough to prevent it, or whether he will land on the perch of not preparing for a land war in Europe, because of the theory that implementing the North Atlantic Pact with land armies might incite the Soviet leaders into an aggressive attack against Western Europe.

Convenient as it may be for a speaker to fluctuate to all sides of an issue, it is very disconcerting and confusing to those who try to weigh and evaluate the premises and principles of any program or policy set forth in such a speech. I believe it is fair to say that the two recent speeches of the Senator from Ohio are subject to the interpretation that he does not believe we should implement the North Atlantic Pact with any additional American military manpower—at least not until our allies in the North Atlantic Pact have raised enough divisions of ground troops to indicate that a checking of Russian aggression in Western Europe could be greatly aided by ground troops—and that in the meantime the Senator from Ohio would rely primarily upon naval and air power for defense against Russian aggression.

It seems to me that the Senator from Ohio does not give sufficient weight to the negative psychological reactions in Western Europe induced by many of the policies he advocates in his two historic speeches. We Americans need to face the fact that our allies in Western Europe are not filled with enthusiasm and rejoicing when they hear of various leaders in the United States proposing to surround them with the protection of a perimeter of bombing bases so that American air power will be able to liberate them in case Russia decides upon a military conquest of Western Europe.

Such talk is bound to cause them to hesitate in developing their defense plans, because such talk does not offer them very much by way of a choice. Such talk seems to leave them in the middle, with Soviet totalitarianism on the one side and American bombing pulverization on the other. Such talk in our country tends to increase the propaganda in those countries for working out the best appeasement program possible with Russia.

I say, Mr. President, most respectfully, that our best defense at home is to cooperate with our allies in the North Atlantic Pact for an adequate defense in Western Europe through a cooperative, military-aid, mutual defense program involving land, sea, and air forces. Such a program not only would serve clear notice to Russia that there would be no time lag as far as the participation of the United States in a war with Russia is concerned, if she should start a military conquest of Western Europe, but it would also put us in the strongest possible defense position from the first hour of that war, because it would give us the best assurance of maximum Allied preparedness in Europe.

I would urge that the people of the United States carefully evaluate the clear import of the foreign policies proposed by ex-President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. It seems to me that they are premised upon the idea that this continent can survive if we withdraw unto ourselves alone and let our allies in Europe go down if necessary, if they do not do exactly what we wish them to do in the matter of implementing the North Atlantic Pact.

However, I wish to make clear that although I disagree with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] in respect to a great many of his premises, as well as the conclusions which he draws therefrom, nevertheless, I think that in his address to the Senate on January 5 he performed a notable service to the Nation.

Striking through the controversies which have centered about our national policy during recent months—improperly directed all too often against personalities—the Senator from Ohio cleared the air and focused attention where it should be—on the issues themselves. At a moment of great world crisis, which threatens American security, he has initiated in the Congress a necessary and highly important debate on the critical question of what policy we should pursue and how best we may carry it through to success. In his able address, the Senator from Ohio gave a splendid demonstration of the proper role of the minority party in a democracy—that of objective debate of the foreign policy in the interests of the safety of the Nation.

No one can, and no one will, I am sure, dispute the two chief aims of our policy as defined by the eminent Senator from Ohio; namely, that the principal purpose of the foreign policy of the United States is to maintain the liberty of our people; and that, after liberty, peace must be the goal of our policy and of our leaders.

The Senator also stated a fundamental truth and a guiding principle when he continued:

> Certainly when policies have been determined, unity in execution is highly desirable, and in the preparation for and the conduct of war it is essential.

The formulation of our foreign policy is, of course, the prime responsibility of the President, with the aid of the Secretary of State and other officers of the executive branch of Government. But Congress participates in the determination of policy, and it is unquestionably necessary that our Nation's policy shall have the support of the Congress and the people.

Therefore, it is a healthy circumstance to have a public debate on aspects of our policy which may be under dispute. I am confident that the conduct of this debate in a nonpartisan spirit can lead to a meeting of minds enabling us to press on with the execution of our policy with that unity which the Senator from Ohio has himself asserted is a necessity.

In this connection I found it most encouraging that, whereas the Senator from Ohio, on January 5, expressed an apparently unalterable opposition to sending more than a token number of American troops to Europe for the implementation of the Atlantic Pact, he subsequently stated that his opposition was not unalterable.

On January 7, during the radio broadcast of Meet the Press, the Senator from Ohio was asked:

> Suppose Eisenhower comes back and says we have to do this thing that you are against and Congress debates it and decides that is what we shall do, you will oppose it? After it has gone through that constitutional process will you acquiesce in that decision?

The Senator from Ohio responded:

> Oh, yes; I would accept it. I voted against the Atlantic Pact and I am willing to accept the obligations of the Atlantic Pact.

In short, I gather that the Senator's position is that he believes we should not commit more than token troops as a part of an international army in Europe under the Atlantic Pact, but that if a majority of Congress thinks otherwise, he will go along with that decision.

Meanwhile, it appears that the Senator is strongly opposed to committing our troops abroad in an Atlantic defense for the following reasons:

First, he sees no convincing evidence that Russia intends to start a war with us. He points out that Russia knows that we are obligated and will enter the war if any Atlantic Pact nation is attacked.

Second, he believes that the effort to build up an Atlantic Pact army capable of checking a Russian invasion must also be large enough to wage aggressive war against Russia, and the attempt to build up that army would probably incite Russia into beginning a war.

Third, the Senator from Ohio believes that the responsibility for the defense of Western Europe rests largely with the nations of Europe.

And finally, he appears to believe that in the event of war in Europe, we could attain mastery of the sea and the air, safeguarding our own country, while aiding Europe primarily by air and sea support.

Mr. President, I must take issue on every one of the points which I believe the Senator from Ohio has set forth in his speeches.

First. According to my sights, it is folly to base our actions on speculation about what the Soviet dictators may or may not do.

Second. No one has proposed an Atlantic Pact army large enough to invade Russia. On the contrary, speaking now as a member of the Committee on Armed Services, it is my understanding that the objective of the North Atlantic Pact is to build up among the members of the North Atlantic Pact a common defense in Europe which would be sufficient to check Russia from taking over Europe. That is quite different from suggesting that there is any contemplation to build up an armed force which would be adequate to invade Russia.

Third. The defense of Europe may be the responsibility of Europe, but it also happens to be vital to our own safety.

Mr. President, I repeat that the defense of Europe may be the responsibility of Europe, but it also happens to be vital to our own safety.

Finally, if the last war taught any lesson at all, it taught that mastery of the sea and air can be won only after years of struggle, when the enemy has been reduced to the verge of collapse, and that, furthermore, the successful defense of Europe requires all the air support, all the sea support, and all the ground support we can throw into battle in case of an invasion of Europe.

I suggest, therefore, that rather than speculate on what the Russians may or may not do, and try to shape our policy accordingly, we must fix our minds on one cardinal fact, and act accordingly. That fact is that the defense of Western Europe and the defense of the United States cannot be differentiated; they are one and the same thing, at least in the early stages of world war III, if it comes.

I would expect the Senator from Ohio to pause before taking the role of prophet and minimizing the danger of a war being started against us by Russia. I should think that he would uncomfortably remember that he said, only 2 months before Pearl Harbor:

> I believe that if we choose to defend the United States on the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, it is so impossible for Hitler or anyone else to attack us that there will not even be an attempt to make such an attack.

Mr. President, as my documentation for the quotation from the speech of the Senator from Ohio, I refer to the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 87, part 13, at page A4363. I read as follows:

> Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by the able senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the Ohio Federation of Republican Women's Organizations on September 22, 1941.
> There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From page A4365, column 1, I read the following excerpt from the speech of the Senator from Ohio:

> I believe that if we choose to defend the United States on the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans it is so impossible for Hitler or anyone else to attack us that there will not even be an attempt to make such an attack.

It is a rather interesting speech. If I felt time permitted I would dwell at some length upon the speech of September 22, 1941. I wish to call attention to two more sentences in it. The Senator from Ohio continued, in his speech of September 22, 1941, to say:

> We have the largest Navy in the world. We have unlimited ability to increase our shipbuilding capacity. The President's argument that the total shipbuilding capacity of Europe is greater than ours is utterly unsound, because ours can be increased indefinitely, and our ability to manufacture steel and other ship materials is greater than all of Europe combined. Furthermore, we will have several years' start on our two-ocean Navy, and Hitler could never catch up with us. It would not be easy for him to organize the productive capacity of Europe. How is he going to get any enthusiastic cooperation from the shipbuilding labor in a dozen countries whose people he is oppressing with an alien dictatorship?

Mr. President, I have no doubt as to how Russia would get that cooperation if she proceeded to take over Europe and impose her slave labor policies on Western Europe, as she has on other countries in Europe which have become her satellites. The only choice she gives them is, "Proceed to produce for Soviet Russia or be shot." That is the police-state method. That is the slave state method.

I am not one of those who hold the view that a conquest of Europe by Russia would make it impossible for Russia to get the production out of Europe that Russia would need in order to carry on a long whittling war against the United States, because when she gives those people only the choice of working or being shot, the instinct of self-preservation will cause most men, as we all know from the success she has had with production in the satellite countries she now has enslaved, to work, even for Communist Russia.

There are some other theories in the speech of the Senator from Ohio of September 22, 1941, which are identical with the views which he expressed on January 5, including that section of the speech entitled "The President Has No Legal or Constitutional Right To Enter Upon a Naval War With Germany." As I was scanning that speech this afternoon on the floor of the Senate, I thought that it was rather interesting to read the following statement in the speech of the Senator from Ohio of September 22, 1941:

> The war policy has never been thought through. It seems to me impossible to bring a war with Germany to a successful conclusion except after many years of destructive warfare. Vast expenditures of money and men will exhaust this country as they are exhausting the world. In the end we may crush Hitler, but in the process of doing so we are likely to set up a complete dictatorship in this country from which we may never return to American democracy as we have known it.

Our experience shows how wrong he was then. Thank God, we did crush Hitler. Thank God, Mr. President, that in World War II we rid the world of one dictator who sought to enslave freedom, and we kept our freedom. I am satisfied that if Russia continues down the road of aggression against freedom again freemen everywhere will rise up, as they did in World War II, and take a stand on the side of freedom. I am satisfied that once again, although at terrible cost, we would crush totalitarianism and preserve freedom, no matter how high the cost.

In my judgment, the prophecy of September 22, 1941, of the senior Senator from Ohio was as unsound then as his prophecy of January 5 and January 7 of this year in regard to foreign policy.

I thought it would be interesting to cite this comment from the speech of September 22, 1941, which the Senator from Ohio made with respect to a great commentator. He said:

> Of course, it is being said now that there will be no expeditionary force. Mr. Walter Lippmann is now advocating the policy of a naval war while we reduce the Army. But just as the President advanced from peace to lease-lend, and from lease-lend to a shooting naval war, the adoption of a naval war policy, after a few months of stalemate, is bound to lead, Lippmann or no Lippmann, to another American expeditionary force.

I take the time to quote from that interesting speech of September 22, 1941, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 25, 1941, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], not in a spirit of personal criticism of the Senator from Ohio, but in a spirit of sincere, friendly disagreement with him as to the underlying thesis of foreign policy set forth in the speech of September 22, 1941, which I think in many respects is similar to the theory of foreign policy set forth in his two historic speeches of January 5 and January 7 of this year.

I suggest, Mr. President, that elementary common sense should tell us that we have to be prepared for the fact that Russia may move into Europe any day from now on, whenever it suits her convenience, and that we must not lose time or momentum in developing adequate defenses here in America and in common with our allies in Europe. I do not venture to predict anything. I merely say that the danger is grave and that we must proceed to take proper precautions.

As for relying almost exclusively on air and sea power, while regarding the defense of Europe merely as the responsibility of the European nations, we cannot do better than to harken to the wise words of Cordell Hull on October 26, 1940, when he warned the American people in circumstances most similar to those of today:

> Should the would-be conquerors gain control of other continents they would next concentrate on perfecting their control of the seas, of the air over the seas, and of the world's economy; they might then be able with ships and with planes to strike at the communication lines, the commerce, and the life of this hemisphere; and ultimately we might find ourselves compelled to fight on our own soil, under our own skies, in defense of our independence and our very lives.

I think that great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, enunciated in that statement words of such deep and significant meaning that all Americans should ponder them anew.

If we have any question about the paramount importance of guaranteeing that Western Europe shall not be permitted to fall into Russian hands, we have only to recall the last war. Surely we cannot have forgotten already the cost in lives and machines and the agony of effort required to defeat the industrial potential of western Europe when the Nazis used it to sustain their military operations. Let us reflect today that it took the combined, all-out power of Russia, the United States, Great Britain, and many other nations to defeat it. Let us therefore reflect what it would mean to our security today if that Western European industrial potential were to be added to that of Russia and aimed against us.

The Senator from Ohio noted that "there is sufficient evidence of a determined plan to communize the entire world, which can be clearly outlined from the writings of Lenin and Stalin just as Hitler's intention could be found in Mein Kampf." He noted that we are now, in fact, engaged in a world-wide battle with Communist imperialism. But then he disclaimed any convincing evidence that Russia intends to start a war with us, and stated to the contrary that "I believe they are still thinking in terms of a slow but steady advance by the methods which they have used up to this time. Those methods are dangerous enough." Indeed, Mr. President, they are dangerous enough, but they are not so dangerous as a war against Europe and against us would be.

I fear that this minimizing of the Russian threat has disheartened the free nations and given aid and comfort to those who would destroy us. The Senator has seemed to endorse the pious Soviet claims of their abhorrence of war and their devotion to peace. He has seemed to support the Russian allegations of warmongering on our part. The Daily Worker, the mouthpiece in the United States of the Kremlin, in a front-page editorial, under date of January 8, entitled "Senator TAFT's Valuable Confessions," used the Senator's remarks as proof of the truth of Russian propaganda, as branding President Truman as the enemy of peace, and as exposing our policy of peace as the Big Lie. Pravda has been having a field day with the Senator's thesis that Russia is not likely to start a war. The entire Communist propaganda machine is capitalizing on this statement to lull the world into a false sense of security and to divide the free nations.

Though some of our political spokesmen may have unwittingly furnished ammunition to the Communist propaganda machine by their words, we can soon correct that circumstance by our deeds. We cannot allow our allies in Western Europe to think that we are going to fail to join with them in building up a common defense in whatever fashion, in whatever magnitude, we jointly agree is essential. We cannot afford to encourage the Communist dictators to think that there is the remotest possibility that we will waver in our determination to resist Russian aggression in Europe. We cannot afford to let them doubt for a minute that we are going through with this job of building an Atlantic force which can prevent the conquest of Europe by the Red army.

In the long run, it is obvious that there is only one means of putting a final halt to Russian imperialistic expansion, whether that expansion is by subversion and infiltration, or by armed assault—and that is by bringing the organized economic, moral, and military strength of the free world to a point where it cannot be challenged by the aggregate forces of the Communists. We must therefore proceed with the building of that defensive force. We must build it primarily in the North Atlantic community where men and machines are in a conclusive superiority in our favor.

Our goals are obvious. They are to prevent a world war if possible, and to win it if it is forced upon us.

But as for the military strategy we should pursue and the way in which we should go about this task of mobilizing our own strength and linking it with that of our allies in a common defense, I submit that these are questions so vast and weighty that they are beyond the power of any one man to answer. No man is wise enough to master all the potentialities and actualities and to prescribe what we should develop in the way of air, sea, and land forces, and the kind and degree of support which we should provide to our allies under the Atlantic Pact.

On this point, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spoke with great cogency—it seems to me—when he said on January 11 on this floor:

> It is hard to understand how the Members of the House and Senate, even making due allowances for their fine qualities, can possibly attempt to function as the operations section of a general staff and decide where and how and in what amount troops, ships, and planes should be sent to foreign lands.

There is only one acceptable, reliable basis for such enormous decisions. Our decisions must be arrived at by the process of consultation between the executive branch, our military leaders, and the leaders of both parties in Congress. As far as is practicable, we must draw upon the best brains throughout the Nation, for, when all is said and done, in the great task of administering a democracy there are no substitutes for brains. I think in this great crisis we must call upon the brains of America in every field of endeavor to make their maximum contribution to the security and the defense and the safety of our great Republic. So I say, so far as is practicable, we must draw upon the best brains throughout the Nation—the scientists, industrialists, labor leaders, farm leaders, and all the rest. In short, we must draw upon every particle of expert knowledge, intelligence, and professional skill at our command.

I submit that this is the only way in which to determine what we shall do toward implementing the Atlantic Pact.

Incidentally, I would like to say that I can see no grounds whatsoever for questioning the President's constitutional authority to send United States troops abroad. However, in the case of the implementation of the Atlantic Pact, it is clearly desirable, I agree, that the Congress be consulted in advance of proposed commitments, in the interest of national unity.

I digress from my manuscript long enough to say, Mr. President, that I think the President of the United States has a great opportunity for leadership in connection with the entire issue involving the sending of troops to Europe. In my opinion, the President of the United States should do more than consult and advise with the leaders of Congress and the other leaders of our great country. I think the President of the United States should sit down with those leaders, put all the facts and problems on the table, and work out with them, in the interest of unity, for which he pleaded in his great address at the joint session of the Congress the other day, a program for implementing the North Atlantic Pact around which there can be the maximum possible amount of agreement among us in carrying out the clear obligations of that treaty.

I believe it is a mistake, Mr. President, for the Chief Executive of this land to take any narrow technical position from the standpoint of his constitutional powers and say, "I will stand on those powers alone." I do not question under our Constitution the power of the Commander in Chief in time of great national emergency to take the steps necessary to protect the security of the Nation. But I want to plead with him this afternoon, Mr. President, to recognize that in an hour of crisis it is true that unity is of tremendous importance to security. I would that he would make clear to the Congress and to the other leaders in our country that he intends to work out, in conference and in exchange of ideas, a program involving the implementation of the North Atlantic Pact, including the question of the use of American ground forces.

Speaking of unity, I applaud the President's call for unity in his state of the Union message, and I applaud the immediate endorsement by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] of that call for unity. I particularly welcome the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the National Press Club that he is "quite prepared to sit down with the President of the United States, or anybody else on the majority side, and try to work out a program which could command the unanimous and consistent support of the people of the United States."

I would in good spirit remind the Senator from Ohio, however, that under the organization of the Congress, the formulation of official policy is done through the official committees of the Congress having jurisdiction over the subject matters with which their existence is concerned. I sincerely hope that the Senator from Ohio will be willing to sit down and confer, and consult, and discuss these questions of foreign policy, always keeping in mind, however, that he does not speak individually for the Senate of the United States or for my party, but only as one Member of the Senate of the United States and as one member of my party, and that the formalization of policy must necessarily, insofar as the Senate is concerned, go through the channels of the appropriate standing committee of the Senate, which in respect to foreign policy happens to be the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and in respect to my party happens to be, in the last analysis, so far as our Senate organization is concerned, the Republican conference.

I pray that all of us will respond to the stirring invitation of the majority leader, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] when he said:

> I am asking that my colleagues stand together, unite, make clear by their every action and their every word that all of us have a single overriding objective—the good of the Nation and the peace of the world.

I think, Mr. President, this is the spirit in which we must determine our policies and actions from here on out.

One most ill-considered statement by the Senator from Ohio was that of January 5, when he said, with respect to Communist China:

> We might as well have a declared war.

Surely the Senator from Ohio cannot have forgotten that our action in Korea is part of the United Nations action against aggression, and is nothing more than that; and surely the Senator cannot have realized the extreme gravity of his suggestion.

This gravity becomes clear when we recall the terms of a joint resolution of Congress declaring war, as for instance the joint resolution of Congress on December 8, 1941, when war was thrust upon the United States and we were forced to take action in our own defense. I shall read that resolution because I would call to the attention of the Senate and of the American people what it means to declare war. That joint resolution of war reads, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Japan which has been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and the President is hereby authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial Government of Japan; and, to bring the conflict to a successful termination, all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, the consequences of a declaration of a state of war are clear from the terms of the resolution. With its approval by the President, we start down a road from which there is no turning back. We pledge all our human and material resources to winning the war. We will fight until one of the parties capitulates or until there is a negotiated peace.

Is that what the Senator from Ohio would have us undertake against Communist China? I do not think it is. I do not think he took proper thought before uttering those words. During these precarious times I think we must be very careful to avoid such ill-considered statements.

It is my belief that we should do everything possible to prevent war from spreading in the Far East; but here, again, I say that the determination of our strategy and tactics in the Korean crisis must also, and solely, be determined on the basis of consultation and agreement between the executive branch, our military leaders, and the leaders of both parties in Congress.

As I said in a major speech which I made on foreign policy during the last week of the last session of the Congress, I happen to be one who believes, on the basis of at least such information as has been made available to me to date as a member of the Armed Services Committee, that we should not permit ourselves to become sucked into a war in China. I believe that is exactly what Stalin would like to see us do, because I think he knows that the great danger to us is that if we were to become involved in a war with China, we could not win it, because even though we were to win the military victories of such a war—at the great sacrifice that I am sure we would find they would cost us—we still would lose the war, in the last analysis, because to conquer China would be to occupy her, and to occupy her over the years would bankrupt us. That is why I said in that speech—and I repeat it today—that at least on the basis of the information made available to date, I think we should be careful not to become involved in a war within China, but we should establish the strongest possible blockade and embargo against China; we should make perfectly clear to China that we consider her to be an aggressor against the peace and that we recognize her to be a stooge and a tool of Russia, which, after all, is the power behind the hot war that China in a very real sense in some segments of Asia is presently carrying on.

Mr. President, the Chinese question is one concerning which I think we should delay taking any course of action which might fall within the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio of a procedure which might as well amount to a declaration of war.

For a long time to come, in my belief, the Atlantic Pact and its implementation must figure as a cardinal factor in the defense of freedom. I also believe that we must continue to do everything in our power to strengthen and support the United Nations.

I think that it is going much too far to say that we have to write off the United Nations as powerless to put a brake on aggression.

The frantic efforts of the Soviet Union to escape the censure of the United Nations and the determined efforts of the Chinese Communists to bludgeon their way into membership, attest the importance which the Communist states ascribe to the United Nations. The United Nations has demonstrated the very real power of the mobilized opinion of the world, and has proved that this power can both check aggression and halt warfare, as we saw in Indonesia, Palestine, and India. This power of mobilized opinion, even with the backing of military force, has so far failed in Korea, but that does not at all mean that justice will not yet be won for the Korean people and that the United Nations will not be due the credit for that victory of justice.

The United Nations has introduced a new factor in world affairs—a means of solving problems otherwise insoluble. It offers the means for solving by international cooperation world problems which cannot be solved by the separate action of nations. It affords the possibility of curing the conditions of human ignorance, want, and misery, which furnish the seeds of war and offer communism its opportunity to victimize people too confused and too weak to resist. We should be short-sighted indeed not to recognize that the United Nations is indispensable to the defense of freedom and to the ultimate establishment of a decent and orderly world.

It is true that the United Nations was established on the assumption of the collaboration of the great powers, and that the Soviet Union has betrayed its promise of collaboration. But the Soviet Union has by no means been able to prevent the growth of the power and influence of the United Nations.

The decline in the effectiveness of the Security Council has been matched by an increase in the power of the General Assembly, where the voice of all nations is heard. The General Assembly may have only the authority to recommend, but the member nations have the power to act on those recommendations. That is of vital importance.

The United Nations obviously can be no stronger than its members and their ability and determination to support its steps against aggression. It is incumbent on the United States to give that support; it is equally incumbent on all the other free member nations to give that support. I am one of those who believe that this collective support will be given.

I wish to set forth the following 10 suggestions which I think should be heeded in the crisis which confronts our Nation:

First. The danger that the Soviet Communists will resort to war to advance their imperialistic aims is of the utmost gravity and reality. There is no doubt whatsoever that Communist imperialism is out to spread over the world—over Europe and Asia by indirect aggression if possible, ultimately, I think, by war if necessary. If the Communists were to get the men and machines of those areas working for them, they could produce all types of guns, tanks, planes, and ships in tremendous quantities. They would have bases much closer to the United States from which to launch all-out atomic attacks as their stockpile of weapons increased. They would be in a much better position to strike at us than they are now. With airpower operating from European bases, and snorkel submarines operating off our coasts, they would pose a threat to our very existence as a free nation. That is why I think that the issue of America's survival is before us in the years immediately ahead.

Second. The problem of apportioning our economic aid and military manpower and matériel among Europe, Asia, and the United States is immensely complicated. No one man is wise enough to answer this question. No one man is wise enough to say hold Japan and Formosa, and let the rest go. No one man is wise enough to say use air and sea power but not land forces. The only proper basis for answering such questions is through consultation between the executive branch of the Government, military leaders, civilian experts, and the congressional leaders of both parties. This task should be approached with humility and in a nonpartisan spirit.

Third. Domestically, we must make an all-out effort to improve our military posture. The way to do this must be determined by consultation and agreement by our leaders in the executive and legislative branches of the Government. We must mobilize our economic and military resources into a coordinated working team, with every American citizen devoting his full effort and interest to the success of our mobilization effort. It is only by an all-out national effort that we can build up the war-making strength which will make clear to Russia that she has everything to lose and nothing to gain with a continuation of her aggression against freedom and her threat to peace. Such a program means sacrifice, spelled with capital letters, sacrifice for each one of us; but it also means freedom. It also means that each one of us must grasp the meaning of the struggle—that each one of us has an obligation to preserve the spiritual, moral, and cultural values of civilization against the onslaught of those who would destroy them.

Fourth. As for our international cooperation, I believe that it is essential that we continue to give the fullest possible support to the United Nations and that we do everything that we need to do to assure the effective implementation of the Atlantic Pact. The United Nations Charter and the Atlantic Pact are a part of the law of the land. We should continue to meet our obligations under these two treaties. These treaties are not, of course, a one-way street. We expect to fulfill our responsibilities, but we expect other nations to do the same.

Fifth. Our goal is peace. In all our defense effort, let it never be forgotten by the people of this and other countries that we want peace and will only depart from it if our liberty and lives are threatened. That is why I list our goal of peace as the fifth suggestion I would have the American people emphasize in their thinking on the problems involved in this international crisis.

Sixth. We must be aware of our national purpose. What we are really trying to do is to defend our liberties and to assure that they shall not be replaced by the tyranny and terror of a Communist regime.

Seventh. In order to preserve our liberties, every American citizen must do his duty. Our circumstance is not unlike the colonial days when the early settlers took their stations in the blockhouse when danger threatened from without. All of us today must be alert against those who would commit treason against our purpose. There are thousands of Communists in our midst today who are ready to stick a dagger in our back at a word from Moscow. As I have said many times, and now repeat, we need to remember that Soviet Russia never moves from the outside in against a nation until she is ready to move from the inside of that nation out to meet her forces coming from without.

Eighth. The need for unity applies to management and labor. We must have cooperation in keeping the great workshop of America at full production. We cannot afford the luxury of strikes or of employer intransigence.

Ninth. There are three great means of getting the public behind our national effort and of sustaining their morale through the long period of effort ahead. Our press, radio, television, and movies have a great opportunity to keep the public informed and alert. Private organizations and universities have the same opportunity. And the churches of the land, perhaps above all, have the opportunity to keep us dedicated to our high moral purpose and to inspire us to a rededication to the spiritual values of democracy unknown in Communist dictatorships.

Every institution of enlightenment in North America, including the church, lodge, press, radio—every group where free men gather—should join forces in the struggle for peace. We cannot win the peace by wishing for it, nor by blaming the politicians because we do not have it, nor by adopting the fatalistic attitude that war is inevitable, nor by placing all the blame on our enemies in the war now gripping the world.

But while we must not abandon the struggle for peace nor go to the other extreme of adopting a fatalistic attitude that all-out war is inevitable, the freedom-loving nations must nevertheless build up their strength to the end that the dictators in the Kremlin may be persuaded to the view, before all-out war engulfs us, that Communist aggression must stop.

Tenth. There is no need to be panicky in America. The American people will proceed with courage, determination, and faith that, if we do these things, we shall successfully defend our liberties and our Nation against the menace of Communist imperialism.

The struggle for peace, which is the major crisis of our generation, is a struggle for men's minds rather than for their emotions. It is a struggle for human decency rather than for human debauchery. It involves an appeal to reason. Peace can be won and maintained only if we can convince freedom-loving people elsewhere in the world that rules of reason, procedures of international justice, relinquishment of many selfish interests must be substituted in the thinking of people everywhere for the emotional nationalism that still dominates the world in spite of all our laudatory efforts to set up a system of international justice through law by way of the United Nations.

The Senator from Ohio is entirely right in his contention that it is unwise ever to admit that war is inevitable. But it is even more unwise to insist that it will not happen because we do not want it to happen or because there is no conclusive proof, to the particular satisfaction of any Senator, that the nation we fear does not intend to wage war on us. Russia may seek other, cheaper, and less risky means of destroying us, as it successfully did in the Balkan states, Czechoslovakia and Hungary. It may, as a temporary device, when other methods fail, employ the troops of satellites as the spearhead of conquest. It may concentrate at first, as Stalin has in fact been doing, on nearer and easier victims. But we would be closing our eyes to the enormous perils we face and the entire free world faces if we failed to recognize that we are not only an intended victim of Soviet aggression, but indeed its absolutely inevitable target. Our very strength makes us such a target. If Russia can knock us out, the rest of the world would fall like a ripe apple in her outstretched hand. If she fails to do so and as long as she does, she is certain to have the uneasy feeling that she may some day have to disgorge all the ill-gotten gains that she has acquired during these last years.

The Senator from Ohio says the purpose of our foreign policy must principally be the maintenance of the liberty of our people not "to reform the entire world or spread sweetness and light and economic prosperty to peoples who have lived and worked out their own salvation for centuries, according to their customs, and to the best of their ability." That is so.

But it is precisely because we prize our liberty and want to preserve it that it is so essential that we rally around a common banner with all other nations and people who want to be free and who, like ourselves, are willing to fight to maintain their freedom, if necessary.

The Senator from Ohio admits that the Russian leaders have set forth in their writing sufficient evidence of a determined plan to communize the world.

He declares, and there can be no doubt about it, that it has sought to attain this objective through propaganda and infiltration and, latterly, through the use of satellite troops to attack countries. But he sees no conclusive evidence that the Russians expect to start a war with the United States.

It is difficult to see—

how the Russians today could reasonably entertain the hope that they can conquer the world by military action. * * * I believe they are still thinking in terms of a slow but steady advance by the methods which they have used up to this time.

The logic of events, the dynamics of the Russian drive for world mastery, do not support this hopeful view of the Senator from Ohio. The very fact that when propaganda and infiltration failed to achieve the Soviet objective in Korea, as they did fail, thanks to our efforts and the efforts of the UN, and Russia pushed her North Korean satellite into a military campaign which clearly involved the risk of a general war, suggests that when necessary, Russia will risk war to accomplish her aims. She is far more likely to do so if the risks are slight, if her would-be victims are weak and divided among themselves, than if they are strong and united.

Why did Russia keep up an incessant propaganda barrage against our aid to Greece and Turkey, against the Marshall plan, against western union, against the North Atlantic Pact, against the establishment of the Bonn Republic in West Germany, and against every other measure we and other free nations have taken during these last years to build a barrier of strong, economically stable states in the path of Russian aggression?

The Ohio Senator says he thought at the time and thinks still that the Atlantic Pact was a tremendous mistake, that it helps create the greatest probability of war. "The Atlantic Pact," he says, "could at least be interpreted as an aggressive move." This is what the Russians themselves have been saying in season and out and in every language in which the Voice of Moscow broadcasts its lying propaganda. But was our aid to Greece and Turkey, the economic assistance we gave to the war-stricken nations of Western Europe—and had offered to Soviet Russia and her satellites as well—could they, too, be interpreted as aggressive moves? To believe that is to believe that any move is aggressive which Moscow says is aggressive.

The fact is that Moscow opposed these moves not because of any legitimate fears for its security but because the stronger the free world becomes the less likely those nations are to become victims of Communist propaganda, Communist infiltration, and Communist subversion. It is no coincidence that the peak of Communist strength in France, Italy, and elsewhere in Western Europe occurred when they were at the low ebb of their economies and that the internal menace of communism began to fade when recovery got underway, recovery which the Marshall plan did much to foster in Western Europe.

And, externally, it is also no coincidence that the period of greatest spread of Russian Communist imperialism occurred in the years after the war, when the nations of Western Europe were still bleeding from the terrible wounds they received during the war and we were in the midst of that headlong flight into unilateral disarmament which began for us as soon as the formal fighting had ended. It is no coincidence either that this expansion of the area of Communist imperialism occurred at a time when there was no unity of aim and purpose among the free nations, particularly between this country and its present allies.

Two things were responsible for the maintenance of that precarious peace we enjoyed during those years. The first was that Russia did not have to fight to spread her domination over the large area that between 1944 and 1948 came under her control. Rumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania, the Baltic States, Poland, were taken over from within without a struggle.

Mr. President, ever since that time they have been working under a police-state system of slave labor, and the most reliable information we seem to be able to gather is that they are producing at a rate higher than that at which they produced before World War II, which is some evidence of how effective the police-state method of slave labor can become when people are given the choice of either working or being shot.

The second obstacle was our exclusive possession until 1949 of the atomic bomb. The atomic bomb may not have been the only deterrent that held back the masters of the Kremlin; they may have gambled on that economic collapse which the Kremlin's soothsayers consulting the crystal ball of Karl Marx and Nikolai Lenin have already insisted was both inevitable and imminent. But the atomic bomb was certainly a deterrent, and a powerful one, in preventing Russia from going to extremes.

I digress long enough to repeat what I said in colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Ohio on the floor of the Senate on January 5, that in my opinion our superiority in the stock piling of atomic bombs is probably the prime deterrent against Russian aggression upon Europe. When the Senator from Ohio raises the question as to whether or not implementing the North Atlantic Pact at this time may incite Russia to militarily move against Europe now, I can only answer that I do not know for a certainty. However, I can also answer that it is my sober judgment that so long as we have a superiority in stockpiling of atomic bombs Russia will not take the risk. We will not have such superiority indefinitely. That is why I think it is so important that we take advantage of the precious time which is now available to us, to implement the North Atlantic Pact, so that under a mutual defense program we will have a combined land force, air force, and navy available to the free nation members of the North Atlantic Pact to check Russia, if at a time she has a larger stockpile of atomic bombs she should decide to move her forces over Europe.

Again I say today, as I said on January 5, that the best military advice I have been able to obtain as a member of the Committee on Armed Services, from the top military experts of our Military Establishment, is that the North Atlantic Pact can be implemented by a mutual common defense program, so as successfully to check a Russian advance across Europe. I think we should take advantage of the precious time which is allowed us by our superiority of our atomic stockpile at the present time to carry out what I consider to be our clear obligations under the North Atlantic Pact by joining with the free nations who are members of it in building up the mutual defense program, which our military experts tell us offers us the best hope of checking the conquest of Europe by Soviet Russia. Therefore, I believe that the atomic bomb is still a deterrent, but a steadily diminishing one. The time may not be far distant when it will cease being a deterrent at all, when Russia will possess a stockpile of atomic armaments great enough to destroy our quantitative superiority as, previously, she succeeded in destroying our monopoly of the bomb.

What, then, should we do in the meantime? Should we sit idly by hugging to our bosom the vain hope that if we become strong within our borders the tides of aggression that threaten to sweep across Asia and Europe will bypass us? Or should we seek with the help and cooperation of other, and even more imperiled, nations than ours, to establish a continuation of power that would give the Russian aggressors pause?

We helped establish the United Nations in the hope that it would serve as an instrument with which to maintain peace. But let us not forget that we never dared and never did entrust our security to the protection of the United Nations alone. The United Nations was to be a peace instrument for the future; there was never, since its foundation in 1945, any assurance that it could serve its intended purpose immediately. It was the recognized weakness of the United Nations, certainly no discovery of this moment, that prompted us to seek, within the provisions of the Charter and in line with the Charter's principles and purposes other means of bolstering the peace and our security and the security of the free world. That is why we negotiated and concluded the Rio Pact. That is why we negotiated and concluded the North Atlantic Pact.

By the latter agreement, to which the Senate gave its overwhelming consent, we formally linked our fate with the fate of nations who, in many instances, had twice been associated with us in two world wars. These wars had had their origin in Europe. Both times we had been the aloof spectators of the struggle for power that had led to devastating conflict; we had stood by while aggressors rampaged, doing nothing to deter them, only ultimately and inevitably to be drawn into the conflicts these aggressors had provoked. Is there any assurance that the third time we will be any more successful in staying out of a conflict arising on that continent? There is, in fact, far less likelihood of that now than there was in 1914 or in 1939. Indeed, in addition to all other compelling factors that link our fate with the nations of Western Europe, we are now bound, as we were not then, by a legal commitment to intervene if they are attacked.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] not only admits this but, let it be said to his credit, insists on this. Though he opposed the Atlantic Pact at the time it was made and regards it as a dangerous development, he recognizes that because of it an attack by Russia on any of the European nations that signed the pact would be treated by this country as an attack on us. He says:

> We have clearly notified them—the Russians—that any attack in Europe upon the members of the Atlantic Pact means a third world war, and we are obligated to enter such a war under the terms of the Atlantic Pact.

But in that case, I ask, does not common sense dictate that, as a Nation eager to avoid war, we do all we can to build up the strength of our partners and reinforce the alliance in every way we can, so as to make sure that the aggressor will not be tempted by Europe's weakness to seek new territorial gains?

In view of the history of these last 37 years, it would seem to be silly to say that we have no direct stake in Europe's peace, for Europe's peace is ours; or in Europe's security, for Europe's security is part and parcel of our own. The defense of Western Europe is no ill-considered act of idealism on our part, no expression of charity, no move on our part to interfere in the activities of other nations.

The defense of Western Europe is our concern precisely because our first consideration must be, as the Senator from Ohio insists it is, the defense of America.

Nor is it our concern merely for reasons that are found written indelibly on the pages of history or because of the legal commitments we have made. There is also the overriding fact that if Europe is lost to Russia, our position, already as grave as any we have ever found ourselves in since we became a Nation, would become perilous in the extreme.

The free world today possesses a vast potential preponderance of power over the slave world of Russia and her satellites. All the tests that one can apply—comparative steel production, electric power output, production of coal and cotton and essential raw materials, the possession of technical skills, and so forth, all prove that contention. Taking the free world as a whole, its population, too, is greater than that of the slave world. But this potential strength has no meaning if the free world is divided and it would turn into an active inferiority, so far as we are concerned, were Russia to take possession of the mines and smelters and factories of West Germany and France and the Benelux states.

The one area in which the west is clearly inferior is in the military sphere, and it is precisely here where the greatest danger arises to the pease and freedom and security of the free world.

It was this fact, among others, which led the nations of Western Europe, together with the United States and Canada, to join in the North Atlantic Pact. Since Western Europe was only beginning its economic recovery, the corollary of that pact was the military assistance program. The rearmament of Western Europe, under that program as originally envisaged, was to be a slow-paced affair. We thought we had time. We assumed that while Russia would indefinitely continue to wage her cold war, she would stop at the point of military aggression. Events in Korea beginning last June proved us wrong. They proved that, if other means failed—and throughout the world other means were failing—Russia would use force. The Korean assault development was an alarm bell. It awakened us to the peril we were in, the peril the world faces. It was an alarm bell to other nations, too, although their response was not, in all instances, as rapid and as far reaching as many of us felt their perilous situation demanded.

This time lag between our reaction to the Soviet menace and the reaction of our allies is unfortunate. The sooner it is overcome the stronger and more secure the free world will be. Yet we would be flying in the face of facts to assume, as many are apparently doing, that the nations of Western Europe are doing nothing in their own defense. That simply is not true. They have been laggard in this regard, as we have been; they have not done as much as they should; nor have we. But they have not been sitting by with hands folded, fatalistically awaiting the attack from the east by Russia's hordes. They have begun to build up their armed strength and with our encouragement and assistance, yes, with our prodding, will do more.

Jules Moch, the tough Minister of War of the French Republic, announced recently that by the end of 1951 France will have an armed force in excess of 50 divisions of between 23,000 and 24,000 men each, which means between 1,150,000 and 1,200,000 soldiers.

On the basis of population then, France's force 11 months from now will be comparable in size to a 4,500,000-man American force. This is larger by a third than our own present rearmament plans now contemplate. It may not be large enough. But since even we, with our vastly greater industrial establishment, are fearful of imposing a regime of total mobilization on our economy for fear of what it may do to that economy, so the French and other West Europeans are fearful and with even more reason, since an overburdened economy might give the large Communist element in their midst precisely the talking point they need.

There must be an increased rearmament effort throughout the North Atlantic area. But there is every reason why everything should be done to cushion the seriously weakening effect rearmament may have on the standards of living of those countries, countries only just recovering from the last war.

In the meantime, we cannot afford to stand idly by and take the complacent attitude that Western Europe's rearmament and military strength is Europe's own concern and none of our business. It is our business—for we are all in this together. As Ben Franklin said on another but not dissimilar occasion in the past, "Either we hang together or we shall certainly hang separately."

I am no military expert and do not profess to know exactly how much rearmament is needed to hold the Russian hordes at bay; or what specific forms that rearmament effort should take. I do not know how many troops, how many planes, how many tanks, how many ships, are needed to secure the peace. In this matter, I trust the judgment of the real experts. If we are to fight a common war—and the same holds for the effort which we all pray will be successful to build up sufficient strength so we can avoid a war—it makes no difference where our strength is deployed. If it will do more good to deploy part of it in Europe rather than keep it here at home in the defeatist belief that Europe is lost anyway, then by all means, that strength or the necessary part of it should be deployed in Europe.

When I say it makes no difference where our strength is deployed, I hasten to add that I think the decision as to where it should be deployed should be left to the military experts, because from the standpoint of their military strategy it of course makes a great deal of difference. I believe we must put them in a position so that they will have the power and the authority to deploy it where they can best check the advance of Russian aggression against freedom.

It seems to me there is all the more reason for doing so if, by this practical example of our readiness to combat aggression should an agression be launched against the west, we inspire West European nations to do more than they have been doing for the common defense of all of us.

As Eisenhower said to the French and British people over the radio the other day, "There is power in our union—and resourcefulness on sea, land, and air. Aroused and unified, there is nothing which the nations of the Atlantic community cannot achieve."

I say, Mr. President, that I believe Eisenhower is right in that if we will stand together as united, free peoples, members of the North Atlantic family, we can make perfectly clear to Russia that she does have everything to lose by a continuation of an aggressive course of action against freedom. I think it plain that each and every one of us must recognize the fact that the hour in which we live is one of the darkest and most critical in the history of the Western Hemisphere. We must, therefore, keep calm, keep our heads clear, and keep our courage strong. This is no time for emotional, hysterical reaction. It is a time which calls for facing resolutely the ugly reality of Soviet aggression against freedom.

We must make clear to Russia and Communist China, through the procedures of the United Nations, that we stand ready to negotiate an honorable peace without appeasement, and that we are firmly determined to resist, along with our allies in the United Nations and through the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, a continuation of Communist aggression whether by direct assault or through the subterfuge of satellite attacks.

The people of the United States and freedom-loving peoples elsewhere must demonstrate to the other peoples of the world that we intend to practice our democratic principles, that we intend to put into practice the spiritual meanings of democracy, that we intend to translate into action our faith in the dignity of the individual, and that we intend to establish in the century of struggle ahead a system of international justice through law under which conflicts between nations can be settled through the processes of adjudication rather than through a resort to arms.

Whether or not mankind in the next century attains peace through a system of international justice by law depends in no small measure upon what we do in this session of Congress. If we keep faith with our allies in the North Atlantic Pact and if they in turn keep faith with us to the end that a mutuality of strong Allied defense confronts the Soviet leaders, I think time will be in our favor and on the side of peace.

If, on the other hand, we show weakness now by way of division among us over the defense of Europe now, I fear that time may prove to be on the side of war.

Granted that the risk of war is very great in this dark hour no matter which course of action we may follow in Europe; nevertheless, it seems clear to me that our greatest strength is to be found in standing with our allies in defense of principles of human liberty which we know to be right.

ATLANTIC UNION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, when General Eisenhower arrived in Europe, he said:

Aroused and united, there is nothing which the nations of the Atlantic community cannot achieve.

President Truman, in his state of the Union address, said:

The heart of our common defense is the North Atlantic community.

The distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who just preceded me, stated in very forceful terms the necessity of having unity and of standing together with our democratic allies of the North Atlantic under some system of law.

All of us undoubtedly agree with these sentiments. The lessons of history teach us that if the people of the democratic nations stand together and are willing to work for their freedom, no dictator, however ruthless he may be, would dare upset the peace and stability of the world.

In an effort to bring about a closer working together and unity among the people of the world who believe in freedom, I am pleased again to submit a concurrent resolution proposing the Atlantic Union.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may send to the desk a concurrent resolution, submitted by me, for myself, the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from California [Mr. NIXON], the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con Res. 4), submitted by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. CAIN, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. ECTON, Mr. FLANDERS, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GILLETTE, Mr. HENDRICKSON, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HILL, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. HUNT, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. KILGORE, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. LONG, Mr. MAYBANK, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. NEELY, Mr. NIXON, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. THYE, and Mr. YOUNG) was received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty have declared themselves "determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law," and "resolved to unite their efforts for collective defense and for the preservation of peace and security"; and

Whereas they have agreed in article 2 of that treaty to "contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being" and to "seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies" and to "encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them"; and

Whereas the principles on which our American freedom is founded are those of federal union, which were applied for the first time in history in the United States Constitution; and

Whereas our Federal Convention of 1787 worked out these principles of union as a means of safeguarding the individual liberty and common heritage of the people of 13 sovereign States, strengthening their free institutions, uniting their defensive efforts, encouraging their economic collaboration, and severally attaining the aims that the democracies of the North Atlantic have set for themselves in the aforesaid treaty; and

Whereas these federal union principles have succeeded impressively in advancing such aims in the United States, Canada, Switzerland, and wherever other free peoples have applied them; and

Whereas the United States, together with the other signatories to the treaty, has promised to bring about a better understanding of these federal principles and has, as their most extensive practitioner and greatest beneficiary, a unique moral obligation to make this contribution to peace; and

Whereas the United States and the other six democracies which sponsored the treaty have, by their success in drafting it and extending it to others, established a precedent for united action toward the attainment of these aims, and the creation of a free and lasting union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to invite the democracies which sponsored the North Atlantic Treaty to name delegates, representing their principal political parties, to meet this year with delegates of the United States in a Federal Convention to explore how far their peoples, and the peoples of such other democracies as the convention may invite to send delegates, can apply among them, within the framework of the United Nations, the principles of free federal union.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, in connection with the agreement by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] to join as a sponsor of the concurrent resolution I desire to say that he feels, as do many of us, that more stress should be put on economic aspects of Atlantic union, and that at an appropriate time he expects to offer an amendment to stress the economic aspects. He has asked that I make that explanation, which I am pleased to do.

An identical measure (S. Con. Res. 57) was submitted on July 26, 1949, on behalf of 20 Senators.

Our own resolution aims to back up General Eisenhower by calling a convention to begin creating the Atlantic Union.

It is General Eisenhower's task to organize a powerful Atlantic army. Yet there is no effective Atlantic civil power to which he can report now—nothing but the 12-headed Atlantic Council, which has power only to recommend.

The solution of this problem is our own responsibility. The Atlantic Union resolution would have us tackle this problem at once.

Since that time impressive progress toward Atlantic Union has been made, but it has not been nearly enough. Our fellow citizens are organizing behind it through the Atlantic Union Committee, whose president is Justice Owen J. Roberts, and whose vice presidents are Will L. Clayton and Robert P. Patterson. The committee now has 112 chapters in 42 States. Organization is proceeding in Canada, Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium. In June the Canadian Senate, in which the Government has an overwhelming majority, passed, with only one negative vote, an Atlantic Union resolution almost the same as ours.

This resolution is plain and direct. It is not a plea for world government; it is a means of setting in motion the machinery to attain once again the ideal of peace and freedom as a primary object of free people in the Atlantic community. It is investigative only; it commits us to nothing except to look at a prospective method for real peace.

This is what the Atlantic Union Resolution does, and this is all it does: It requests the President to call a convention of the sponsors of the North Atlantic Pact, and any other free countries the group wishes to invite, to explore together the extent to which they might apply among themselves, within the framework of the United Nations organization, the principles of American federation.

A resolution identical to this gained the support of more than 90 Senators and Representatives of both parties in the Eighty-first Congress. Many distinguished Americans testified in support of it in hearings before the Senate and House Committees on foreign relations.

A Gallup poll showed that 64 percent of Americans favor "a closer relationship or union" among Atlantic Pact countries.

Today the picture is undoubtedly gloomy. But we can have much hope because I know that we sincerely believe that there is no problem that man cannot solve if he looks squarely at it and does several things: First, if he clearly and calmly analyzes the nature of the problem; second, if he settles on a course of action adequate to meet the problem; and Third, if he pursues that course with persistence, determination and the faith that what is right deserves his every ounce of energy.

I see the present problem like this. The Soviet Union is bent on world conquest. Her weapons are propaganda and brute force. Her success has been phenomenal. Already she has reduced 11 countries to the rank of satellite, not counting the crumbling Korea. Without putting a single Russian on the firing line, the Kremlin has become master of an area stretching from the Elbe to the Pacific—15,000,000,000 square miles of it—one-third of the earth. It contains over 700,000,000 people. But still the Soviet prowls for plunder and conquest. A dozen areas tempt her next move.

In a world increasingly engulfed by the Red tide, it is up to the people who love and value freedom, both for themselves and for others, to cope with both these Soviet tactics. The present regime in Russia is rooted in revolution and is using revolutionary methods. To face this threat, we must bring to bear something more than the customary and ordinary. The situation is extraordinary.

The Atlantic democracies have already taken some steps to meet this growing threat: The Truman doctrine, Marshall plan, Western Union, and now the Atlantic Pact. All these steps showed recognition of the need for concerted effort. But they were only piecemeal steps and have not provided an over-all solution to the problem.

The Atlantic Union Resolution proposes that we begin now to see if we cannot improve upon our first essay, the Atlantic alliance. This resolution proposes that we invite the other six sponsors of the North Atlantic Treaty—Canada, Britain, France, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxemburg—to meet in a Federal convention with our delegates and begin now to explore, at least, whether we cannot work out a constitution of government which will give all free nations the power that there is in our own Union of 48 States.

Some fear that to call the proposed Atlantic Federal Convention now would interfere with the efforts the Government is already making to meet the emergency. Let me stress that this convention is not a substitute for any of the existing machinery, whether that of the Atlantic Pact, the United Nations, or any other.

The convention would merely explore whether a still stronger solution than the Atlantic Pact could not be found on Federal Union lines, at least for the democracies that sponsored the pact. It would explore only whether such a union could be made—to quote the resolution itself—"within the framework of the United Nations" for the purpose not of replacing but of strengthening that organization.

Let us wait no longer for another Pearl Harbor, Dunkerque, or Verdun to unite us. Let us begin now to back General Eisenhower with all the power there is in union.

The fact is that the Kremlin's forces are united politically, militarily, and economically in one huge mass of power. The democracies are divided. The Soviet empire has one foreign policy, and is under one command ready to move quickly at its will. The democracies have 12 foreign policies, 12 heads of command. They cannot function as a unit.

As matters are going now, unless we take steps toward effective union for our own defense, we are confronted with a growing neutrality on the part of the nations of Western Europe.

In the thirties, Hitler rubbed his hands to see neutralism in the United States delivering Western Europe to him. Today Stalin gloats over the spectacle of neutralism rising in Western Europe. This anxious European desire to keep out of war by being neutral is now causing some Americans (who forget they fell for the same delusion themselves a dozen years ago) to say in effect: "To the devil with you. You're no good. You are not worth helping. We'll go it alone."

Nor is this ever-developing split between the United States and its European allies the only division among them that Stalin is gloating over now.

Stalin knows how deeply divided the French and British are over European Union and the Schuman plan. Stalin knows how little real agreement there is, despite all the outward show—between the United States and France on the issue of how to rearm Germany. How can he help but know how divided we and Britain are in the Far East, with one ally recognizing Red China diplomatically and the other refusing such recognition and insisting that Red China be recognized now only as an aggressor?

Do you suppose that Stalin is blind to the fact that the Atlantic Community is shot through with the divisions which the principle of unlimited national sovereignty has always produced?

The problem then boils down to this: How can the Atlantic democracies—for they are the ones to which the rest of the still independent world looks for security against Kremlin grabbing—how can they achieve a unity comparable to, or even surpassing, that of the Communist bloc? The bitter question of today is how can we avert war; or, if it comes, how can we win it.

Undoubtedly, unity in the Atlantic Community is an absolute necessity in this crisis. Its unity is necessary for the future of free men everywhere. Actually the policy of the United States and Western Europe has been to move toward more integration and union since 1947—militarily, economically, and politically. We moved through the Marshall plan, Western Union, the Council of Europe, the Schuman plan, and the Atlantic pact.

When the North Atlantic Council was set up, it spanned the Atlantic. The Council is composed of the foreign ministers of the pact countries who meet periodically. Now that General Eisenhower has been appointed supreme commander of the Atlantic forces and a Defense Production Board is being set up, many people believe that the ultimate, and the necessary, in unity has been achieved. This is not correct, in my opinion.

Take a look at the machinery of the NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. What kind of unity does it permit? Is there a single command that can move with decision? Not really. General Eisenhower is the supreme commander. But he is responsible to the standing group of the NATO and this group is responsible to the defense committee which, in its turn, is responsible to the Atlantic Council. Therefore, at the very minimum, the general has 12 bosses. Likewise, the projected head of the North Atlantic Defense Production Board will be hedged around with bosses. This is hardly a set-up for quick, decisive action, such as the Soviet Union can set in motion.

The resolution, as I said, merely calls for an exploratory convention. It would commit us to nothing. Whatever came out of the convention would have to be referred back to the voters of each participating nation for ratification. This country cannot be committed without the say-so of its citizens.

It is well to be reminded that we are challenged by a government based on revolution and using revolutionary methods. We must defeat it with revolutionary methods of our own. Our Government, too, is based on revolution, the most inspiring and the least bloody revolution the world has known, the American Revolution, that combined the ideals of liberty and union.

The great difference is that the Communist revolution is based upon dictatorship and a denial of freedom. The American revolutionary method, which this resolution seeks to extend, is based upon freedom and a recognition of an individual's worth. It is to a limited extent based upon the same revolutionary idea which brought the representatives of the Thirteen Colonies together in 1787 out of which developed the greatest political and economic federation the world has ever known.

No propaganda could have the electrifying, hope-inspiring effect on freemen everywhere as that which would result from the prompt passage by Congress of the Atlantic Union resolution.

I do not think it would take too long to get the federation under way, if we determined to enter such a union. After all, the Constitution of the United States—which had no precedent—was written in about 100 days and ratified in 16 months. That was an age when communication was largely by word of mouth and voting devices very unwieldy.

Merely convoking the convention would electrify the whole free world. We remember how the whole West perked up when the Marshall plan was announced even though it was not implemented for some time. When the Atlantic Treaty was signed, it inspired immediate confidence.

Should the Union be actually started, the West will feel for the first time that it is a unit; there will no longer be doubts of who will come to whose support in times of peril. The whole community will be rejuvenated—revitalized—supremely confident of its powers to maintain its own way of life. The Soviet would be far less likely to risk war for she would know that she would have to take on the whole union if she did. Gone would be her chance of keeping us divided, of picking us off one by one.

The delegates to the federal convention will have to work out many problems by compromise, just as we did in the American federal convention, but I believe that any final union would be largely patterned after our own. The union should have limited powers, I think, dealing only with those affairs which concern the welfare of the uniting peoples as a whole. We have failed utterly to establish peace and freedom using the traditional methods of diplomacy which developed in nineteenth-century Europe; it is time we turn back to the method of federation which was created here in America and which has proven so successful.

We have great confidence in the ability of General Eisenhower to organize a powerful Atlantic army, but we cannot wait until he stalks among freezing, hungry men in some new Valley Forge before recognizing that treaties and alliances cannot be adequate substitutes for government by law.

The task of General Eisenhower is to organize militarily the Atlantic army. He has not the authority to institute a plan by which the Atlantic community can govern its basic foreign and defense policy. This authority rests with the people, and it is the responsibility of civilians—of us and our colleagues in other Atlantic democracies—to stage the setting in which the free people may determine whether they wish to apply a different method than we are now applying in this crisis.

Already, voices are calling for a streamlining of the machinery. Just the other day the Washington Post said:

> There ought to be no further delay in clearing the channels and providing machinery to obtain quick political decisions.

In other words, it is high time to stop trying to achieve integration in a piecemeal, patchwork manner. Let's take the bull by the horns and do what has to be done. Let us give the Atlantic community real unity. We can do this by forming an Atlantic union. We will be following the same pattern by which the diverse States of this Country built a cohesion and force that made it the most prosperous, liberty-loving, forceful country in the world. Our original Thirteen States, you will remember, accomplished little by diplomatic negotiation, but, once they united and set up a Federal Government, military and economic integration were quickly completed and our vast future lay before us for the taking. It can happen again.

There is no reason to fear that the calling of the convention proposed in this resolution might interfere with the efforts we are already making to meet this emergency. In no wise would this convention seek to substitute for existing and operating diplomatic machinery—be it that of the Atlantic Pact, the United Nations, or any other. We would merely investigate the possibility of finding a stronger situation of strength in federation by law than we have in alliance by treaty.

Industrially, 80 percent of the world's production is accomplished in the Atlantic community. Next to the United States, Western Europe is the most important center of industry in the world. Bound to us in federal union, this rich area would be in no more danger of falling to communism. In minerals alone, the Atlantic union would be virtually self-sufficient in the 15 most important ones. The United States by itself has only six of them.

Looking at the industrial capacity of the Atlantic union, any potential aggressor would have to take into serious consideration this tremendous productive might translated into military power. The Economic Cooperation Administration says that the productive power of Western Europe can be made to equal our own. Productive power determines military power.

The union of 400,000,000 people would mean an expanding market. In these days of specialization and mass production, such an expanded market can only mean increased prosperity and higher living standards for the whole community.

From the defense standpoint, the unified Atlantic community would have the vast advantages of unified command, unified forces, standardization of weapons avoidance of wasteful duplication, and a pooling of specialized skills and aptitudes. Its bases would be widely dispersed and so would its industrial areas and vital points, making it infinitely more difficult for a potential enemy to win a rapid war by surprise attack.

There would be 1 foreign policy for the whole community—instead of the 12 it now has under the Atlantic Pact. With only one policy, it would fortify itself against the Soviet technique of divide and conquer—of always trying to drive a wedge between the democracies and capitalizing on their differences. Differing policies make for dissension and suspicion among the democracies—as is happening now on recognition of Red China, relations with Spain, on branding Red China as the aggressor in Korea.

A true union of the democracies would make for peace. Such a combination of resources, productive capacity, and defense forces would create an entity of such vast power that it could not be defeated in war. Hence, a potential aggressor would hesitate about starting something he could not finish. The Union would place a predominance of power on the side of the people who respect law, order, and freedom. Such a combination would put real strength behind the principles of the United Nations. It would provide the armed backing the United States is now unable to create. A decision of the United Nations would then have far more meaning than it has today. There would be no conflict between an Atlantic federation and the United Nations. The purpose of the United Nations is to attain peace. That purpose would be strengthened by Atlantic Union. The Union would be for peaceful purposes and not a federation for aggression. But if war were forced upon the free people, they would indeed have real and united strength for their own defense. We should, of course, continue to support and to endeavor to strengthen the United Nations in the hope that the time may come when all nations through it would be willing to settle their differences. The passage of this resolution would be a great step in bringing the United Nations toward the dream all have for it.

By forming an Atlantic Union, we would bring together peoples with a common heritage and common viewpoint. The whole Atlantic community is characterized by its love of freedom. We Americans love our freedom so much that we have many times placed it even before peace. We must not forget that free men everywhere are the major assets of free men anywhere and to keep our hard-won freedom, we must defend freedom elsewhere. We can best do this by banding together in union.

Forming an Atlantic Union will also enable the Atlantic community to effectively help the underdeveloped countries of the world. Instead of the United States having a rather inadequate point 4 program and the British Commonwealth a Colombo plan, wouldn't it make for efficiency to have the plans combined into one substantial, coordinated program? The democracies could then translate the meaning of democracy into better living conditions. This would effectively meet communism's false promises and make for political stability in backward areas now threatened by the Soviet.

The remaining independent nations of Asia have always depended upon the Atlantic democracies for most of their trade. If the Atlantic democracies form a union, these Asiatic nations will derive tremendous economic benefits from increased trade as well as better prospects for peace.

The union, of course, would not be a static thing. As other nations qualified for entrance—and I think the qualification should be experience and success in self-government because it is essential that the union remain democratic—the union would grow, just as our Union grew. And as this democratic society grew, the likelihood of wars would become less and less.

The Atlantic Union resolution applies directly to the present emergency. The convention could move immediately toward the establishment of a single department of Atlantic defense and foreign policy. As a Rhode Island newspaper recently said:

> If the situation is serious enough for a common army, it is serious enough for a common political command.

We simply cannot risk any longer the differences of opinion on foreign policy which make the democracies misinterpret each other's intentions.

All the features of Atlantic Union do not have to be worked out simultaneously. Under crisis conditions, the first things to take up would be those having to do with Atlantic security—defense and foreign policy. Calling the convention would not mean discontinuing any of the measures now at work for our defense; it would help them and speed them and promote their success.

If I may repeat myself, man is never helpless if he comes to grips with a problem, chooses a course of action, and pursues it energetically.

To my mind, the Atlantic Union plan is realistic and attainable. If anything can avert war, Atlantic federation can. But if even it fails, at least the free world will be in the strongest position to win.

Communism fills the air with dynamic noise. Let the democratic peoples accept that challenge, and show that freemen can work out their destiny and put their ideas on the march again for the benefit of all mankind.

We warned the Eighty-first Congress that we were proceeding too slowly and too incompletely. We urged this investigation in the brief period when gunfire was not being heard. It would have been better to have begun in the comparative calm of two whole years ago. Perhaps we would not be mobilizing for the conflict today if our warning had been heeded.

We lost time while we marked time. We can no longer afford the luxury of killing time, because time will kill us if we do. Korea came quicker than we thought. Another Verdun, another Dunkirk, another Pearl Harbor may come tomorrow.

The Chief Executive extolled us to "stand together with all men everywhere who believe in human liberty."

The way to achieve is to try. The way to stand together is to try to get together. The way to get together is to meet. The free people remaining are ready. The time remaining is short. These look to America that refused to lead before. If there is to be a meeting, we shall have to call it.

It is our move, Mr. President.

BLUEPRINT FOR VICTORY

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, we of the Eighty-second Congress have convened at the beginning of the second half of the twentieth century. America has faced peril at many times in her history, but never since the dark days of Valley Forge has America faced such a desperate fight to survive as a free nation.

America is fighting world war III, today—now. Make no mistake. Not one of America's leaders has dared tell the people this simple truth—a truth so evident that the people can see it for themselves.

Dictators do not declare war. Dictators wage war. At this very hour the free world is fighting a war with Communist Russia, a war far more deadly than any in the recorded history of mankind.

It is not a formal war, fought according to the rules of a chivalry long dead. This is modern, twentieth-century war, an insidious war, a war in which deceit, trickery, subversion, propaganda, and double-dealing are as much the weapons as are tanks, planes, and warships.

World war III began before World War II was ended. For seven long years we have lost the battles of world war III. But it took some 45,000 American casualties of the conflict in Korea to make the American people realize this is a real war.

There is a deadly parallel between the world today and the world of 1940. In that year the dictator was Hitler, and his tyranny was called fascism or nazism. Hitler wheeled his divisions into position in Western Europe, and confronted the free nations which had burrowed into the Maginot line. While the free nations hoped there would be no war, Hitler proceeded, by conquest and deceitful diplomacy, to reduce Eastern Europe. While the Allies fought a phony war, Hitler proceeded to make secure his eastern front.

In 1951, on a global scale, we find a similar situation. The Communists have arrayed their divisions in Europe and in the Middle East. The free nations quaver in the face of this threat. Meanwhile, in Asia, the Kremlin is attempting to reduce and secure its eastern front.

Let us be coldly objective. In this stage of world war III, there are five major fronts. The active shooting front is in Korea. The cold fronts are in the Middle East and Europe. There is the home front in America. Finally, there is the front behind the iron curtain. There is a Communist objective in each of these fronts. The Soviets must achieve victory on each if they are to achieve their objective for the conquest of the world.

In Asia the Red imperialists seek to gain the objectives of unlimited manpower and raw materials, with a secondary purpose of bleeding America's strength.

In the Middle East the objective is that primary essential of modern warfare—oil.

In Europe the objective is industrial potential and know-how. In America their purpose is to raise false issues, to weaken, to divide, to disrupt. Behind the iron curtain they seek to destroy opposition, and by lies to frighten their people into hating America.

Much has been said in recent weeks of the great debate facing the Eighty-second Congress. It is implied that the issue is our foreign policy. The issue, I submit, is not foreign policy. When a nation engages in war its foreign policy is replaced by its strategic concept of how to gain the victory. Our debate is not with regard to policy. The issue is one of strategy. It is not how to prevent war. It is how to win that war.

It is time the administration and the Congress faced squarely this issue. How many battles must we lose before we realize we are fighting a grim, bloody, no-holds-barred war to the finish with Communist Russia?

This is an hour for new beginnings.

America needs a government which will begin anew by throwing off indecision, inaction, quibbling, and side issues.

There are forms of human slavery which man had better die opposing than submit to. The most degrading of these is Soviet communism. Twice in this century the productive force, the physical courage, and the moral will of America have been the decisive factors in saving the world from an endless night of slavery.

But the vice of tyranny is that it ever forgets and it never learns.

It is time we let Soviet Russia know that America will never surrender freedom. Let the Communists ponder well on this. Other dictators have mistaken our will, have miscalculated our intent.

Let Josef Stalin and his Politburo understand this: Since they are determined to rule the world, since they persist in subjugating free peoples, they will inevitably encounter the unconquerable will of America.

Let the Kremlin think on these words, words which diplomatic niceties preclude: Since they are bent on war and conquest, they shall have it. They shall have it with all the strength this Nation can summon—with every freeman who will fight against slavery for his birth right of freedom.

Historically and up to this hour of new beginning, all nations which have wanted peace have found America ever willing to have peace—honorable peace, peace with freedom and justice. The choice has been made not by us, but by the Kremlin.

On this we all agree: They will not take away our freedom.

Today America faces a crisis which demands unity. We are being asked to rally to the support of men and policies which have failed. In all fairness, is it possible to build unity on failure, on incompetence, on expediency? Any Senator has only to read his mail to know there has been a real, a serious—yes, a critical—deterioration in the public's confidence in its leadership.

The very essence of government is to foresee the future.

Even the most naive citizen is aware of the succession of failures on the part of the administration to foresee the future which has brought about the shooting phase of a global war. There is no need to recite this record. It is too well known. The time for bitterness and recrimination is past.

We must compose our differences, and we must agree not on a policy to prevent war, but a strategy to win war.

Today I offer a blueprint for victory. This is a positive program, a constructive approach. I readily concede that those who support it must break with the thinking of the past. In a traditionally American way they must boldly plan for the world of today and tomorrow.

The people must understand an accomplished fact: The United States has been committed to a continuing policy of collective security.

I believe America must stand by her commitments. I believe America must take the leadership in making collective security effective.

It is vital that we have a global strategy grounded on the basic concept that America is the hard core of the free world's strength. We must conserve that strength and must budget its use. It is essential that America does not dissipate its strength in indecisive incidents in the four corners of the globe. American power must be brought to bear on the key fronts.

In a broad sense, as I have indicated, this war will be fought on five fronts. While it is not our intention to lose on any of these fronts, it is clear that America alone cannot overcome the enemy except on the home front.

It is also clear that America can very largely furnish four of the five components of victory. Our Nation has productive capacity equal to that of the rest of the world, we have air power we have sea power, and we have the atomic bomb in quantity. We lack the manpower to fight land wars single handed. We must husband our strength for use to the free world's greatest advantage in the five-front war.

The problem, then, is the issue of our global strategy. We have three original choices.

We can continue by inaction and indecision to lose this war in large and small incidents, while refusing to admit we are engaged in all-out conflict.

Or we can draw lines on maps, erect imaginary walls, establish perimeters, and let the initiative remain with the enemy.

Or we can adopt the course I advocate. We can recognize that this is total war, that each day Russia delays the shooting on the fronts in Europe and the Mid-east gives us that much longer to increase our strength and marshal the forces of freedom; that our ultimate victory is to be won by harassing the dictators on the three fronts in Europe, Asia, and the Middle East, while driving a wedge between the Communist rulers and their common people—those miserable human slaves who yearn for peace and freedom just as we do.

This is not the so-called preventive war. Such argument is specious. If we admit the truth that we are already in war, that free peoples, including American soldiers, are fighting and dying, and have been for many months, this muddle will suddenly come into sharp focus. We are in war. We cannot fight to prevent this war. We must fight to win this war.

Above all else, let us forthrightly admit the great fallacy of our past policy. We have patiently and persistently tried to negotiate with Stalin and his criminal conspirators. We have failed. By now we should realize that the Soviet imperialists are the incarnation of willful evil. We cannot negotiate with Stalin. We had as well try to treat with Satan.

If there remains a place for policy, let it be this: Let us ever hold out to the slave peoples the hope for peace and freedom with but one condition—the condition that they purge themselves of their Communist leaders bent on the conquest of mankind, in order to join with us.

I offer a blueprint for victory:

First. The peoples of all the free world must assure themselves of competent leadership. American responsibility probably is greatest, for our leaders must inspire all nations. It is imperative that President Truman call new men to his executive department, men capable of restoring the confidence and regaining the support of the American people.

Second. America's crying need is military manpower, combat troops. We must raise the ratio of fighting men to the total already in uniform. We must enact a universal military service and training act

Third. We need more modern weapons now—guns, tanks, planes, ships. This means all-out industrial mobilization and round-the-clock production.

Fourth. Over-all ceilings should have been placed on prices, wages, and allocations of materials months ago.

Fifth. The North American continent is the hard core of freedom's strength. It is urgent that we protect America with a modern radar screen in depth, correlated with the most modern interceptor aircraft on full combat alert.

Sixth. Civilian restraints must be matched by government austerity. The frills of bureaucracy must be ruthlessly stripped away. Hand-outs must be abolished. Nonessential spending must be stopped.

Seventh. Only after governmental economies are a fact, should the Congress have the gall to ask the American citizen to pay additional taxes; and then the tax program should be fair, equitable, and aimed at encouraging free enterprise.

Eighth. Any program for victory must be predicated on a loyal, competent, vigorous American State Department. I demand that this administration rid the State Department of the architects of disaster, the termites, and the muddled incompetents whose thinking has led us from victory to disaster, to war, in five short years.

Ninth. We must encourage and assist anti-Communist movements throughout the world, especially those movements operating behind the iron curtain.

Tenth. We should take immediate steps to protect the security of our combat forces against the senseless advertising the troop movements and dispositions, the type and quantity of our military equipment, and the location of new defense installations.

Eleventh. We must budget our military and economic assistance to free nations on the basis of their demonstrated will to fight communism. America cannot be expected to guarantee the freedom of nations which coddle Communists and trade with the enemy.

Twelfth. The confusion of military strategy by diplomatic policy in Asia is ridiculous. We must realistically face the fact that we are at war with Russian communism in Asia. The administration must give General MacArthur the authority to fight a military war. This means bombing enemy supply lines and supply bases; accepting the help of Nationalist China; assisting, with matériel and naval support, the Nationalist invasion of the mainland, through the establishment of numerous beachhead perimeters. If the administration cannot obtain authority from the United Nations or if the administration is unwilling to grant such authority, America's land army should be withdrawn from the fight in Korea which diplomacy renders hopeless.

Thirteenth. We have at last returned our Ambassador to Madrid. Now let us be consistent: Let us invite Spain with her anti-Communist army to join our war.

Fourteenth. We should create an American Foreign Legion of anti-Communists—with or without the consent of governments which call on us to defend them against Russian aggression.

Fifteenth. We must immediately sign with Japan a peace treaty which will permit that country to arm for its own defense and to exploit its production potential in the cause of the free nations.

Sixteenth. We must exert the utmost economic pressure on communism, through a blockade of Red China and the imposition of sanctions against trade of any military significance between the free world and the slave world.

Seventeenth. We must recognize that United Nations' failures are the result of strong Communist obstruction and weak American leadership. The United Nations can survive as the instrument of collective security if we insist that cooperation become a two-way street for free nations. Obviously, Communist nations should be thrown out of the United Nations if the very name of this organization is to have any meaning.

Eighteenth. We must recall the dependents of all servicemen, as well as civilians with nonofficial status, from the war fronts. They must not be permitted to become hostages of the slave nations in the event of all-out attack.

Nineteenth. The administration should vigorously use every law on the books until we achieve absolute control of the Communist conspirators in America.

Twentieth. Let us put an end to the diplomatic farce. We should immediately outlaw international communism by severing diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia and her puppets. When the slave peoples cast out their Kremlin masters, we can welcome them back to the family of nations. Until that day, we have enough home-bred spies without importing them from Russia.

Mr. President, I hope my words today will penetrate the iron curtain, so that the Politburo will know Americans have taken off their gloves.

I hope my words will help rekindle the will for freedom among the nations of all the earth.

I hope I have made it plain that America will fight with her bare fists until this war is won, so that peace with justice will come at last to all mankind.

RECESS

Mr. McFARLAND. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 16, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in whom alone we can find our strength and hope, inspire us now with an earnest longing to lead humanity out of its desperate plight and moral agony into the glorious splendor of a new day.

Grant that we may have a greater faith in Thee and in the spiritual resources which Thou hast placed at our disposal, as we accept the challenge of this high calling. Give us courage as we strive to bring to fulfillment the vision of a social order wherein dwelleth righteousness and peace.

We pray that we may never lose heart or allow our hopes to change to doubt and despair. Help us to open widely the windows of our souls that we may see the dawning of that day when love and friendship, good will, and brotherhood shall take their rightful place in the life of all mankind.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 12, 1951, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

LOWERING VOTING AGE TO 18

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, now that Defense Secretary Marshall has asked for the drafting of our 18-year-olds, as an educator, it seems only reasonable to me that if these boys are old enough to fight they are old enough to vote and have a say as to what is going on in government.

The advances made in the study of current affairs in the high schools throughout the Nation today, especially in the classes in problems of democracy, have properly enlightened the youth of our country and no doubt this study has trained them sufficiently to make them intelligent voters.

If the Defense Department insists on the drafting of our 18-year-old boys, I urge the States to enact legislation that will make it possible for these young men to vote, or it may require a constitutional amendment. I repeat, if they can fight, they can vote.

PROPOSED FEDERAL SALES TAX

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned over the position taken by some administration leaders, as well as prominent Members of Congress, on the proposal to impose a Federal sales tax as a means of raising revenue for financing our national-defense program or to balance our national budget.

I want to protest this invasion of a field of taxation already preempted by the States and their subdivisions. My colleagues should know that in a vast majority of the States, this source of revenue is earmarked for the support of public education in the form of State aid to equalize educational opportunities.

My own State of West Virginia not only levies a 2-percent consumer sales tax that is designated for schools, but it levies in addition a gross sales tax which includes a manufacturer's excise tax which is a major source of State revenue.

The National Government has for more than 30 years operated largely in the field of personal and corporate incomes. Many States have kept out of this field of taxation for this reason. At the beginning of World War II, the State of West Virginia repealed its State income laws so as to leave this field of taxation to the Federal Government.

My State receives annually in excess of $46,000,000 from the source of revenue which the Federal Government now proposes to invade by this legislation. The imposition of a Federal super sales tax on top of this would be confiscatory.

I want also to advise my collegaues that this kind of tax would rest mostly on the shoulders of those least able to pay. Twenty-eight percent of our American families have annual incomes of less than $2,000 a year. Unless the proposed legislation would exempt articles of food and clothing we would only add more misery to their already subnormal existence.

No one should be misled by the term "manufacturer's excise tax." Since this excise tax would be figured as a part of the cost of production, it would in the end be paid by the consumer.

In recent years, many of the Nation's larger municipalities have entered the field of consumer's sales tax in order to meet their budget for ordinary operation expenses. I am advised that New York City would be unable to finance current needs were it not for their sales-tax revenue. What is true in New York City would be true throughout the Nation and far too many millions of our population would be unfairly affected in that they would be forced to pay double taxes while many other millions of our people would escape. This inequality in taxation cannot be justified.

I voted against the proposal in the Eighty-first Congress to impose a sales tax in the District of Columbia. I did this not that I was opposed to the District getting this added revenue, but on the ground that it would set a precedent for the imposition of a national sales tax. Little did I think, only a few months ago, that this move on the part of those most able to pay would come so soon.

THE LATE HONORABLE CHARLES A. KENNEDY

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have the sad mission to announce that Hon. Charles A. Kennedy passed away January 10. Mr. Kennedy had the honor of representing the First Congressional District of Iowa in the Sixtieth to Sixty-sixth Congresses inclusive from 1907 to 1921. He served with great distinction as chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the Sixty-sixth Congress and he served also as chairman of the Mileage Committee in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. Kennedy was born in Montrose, Lee County, Iowa, March 24, 1869, and he lived in Montrose his entire lifetime. He served as mayor of Montrose from 1890 to 1895 and as a member of the Iowa State House of Representatives in the thirtieth and thirty-first general assemblies.

At the end of the Sixty-sixth Congress Mr. Kennedy retired from public life voluntarily and was not a candidate for renomination. However, he continued his keen interest in public affairs to the end of his life and he was a grand counselor to all men of the district who took active part in public affairs. He was especially interested in getting young men into active roles in public affairs and I have found his counsel and his judgment extremely helpful to me throughout my own entire public life.

I have just looked through the Congressional Directory and I find that only seven Members of the House of Representatives today served during the period of Mr. Kennedy's membership in the House of Representatives. I have always enjoyed hearing from them of the high regard in which Mr. Kennedy was held by all who served with him.

MILITARY FORCES

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, the debate over the feasibility of war in Korea is increasing in tempo everytime we hear another adverse report from that unhappy land.

In order to accurately determine public opinion on this vital question the Binghamton Press, in my home city, a Gannett newspaper, is conducting an interesting poll.

I am placing the latest findings by the Press on this poll in the Appendix of the RECORD, and I am sure they will be of interest to everybody as they are to me.

It is apparent that the Korean War is an unpopular one if a sampling of feeling in our section means anything. Whatever my personal slant on strategy or methods in combating world communism, I can assure the House that the sentiment of people in the Triple Cities, as expressed in the Press survey, will carry a tremendous weight with me in making the necessary decisions as to our procedure in this session of Congress.

It is also significant to note that feeling among Press readers concerning the shipment of American troops to Europe is pretty one-sided, in the negative.

As for me, I believe we ought to make sure that every American soldier or sailor who leaves these shores should be equipped with the finest, most modern weapons that it is within the power of the Congress to provide.

My stand in this regard goes back to August 1945 upon the cessation of hostilities in World War II.

At that time I deplored the wholesale mustering out of millions of our fighting men and pointed out that dismantling our Armed Forces and allowing them to fold up could only end in eventual disaster.

Five years later, when the crucial test came in Korea, my observation was proved right.

Let us cloak our boys with the proper fighting gear before we send them anywhere to defend us.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to address the House today for 10 minutes, following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. DEMPSEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes on Wednesday next, following the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. YORTY asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, following any other special orders heretofore entered.

EXTRAORDINARY POWERS REQUESTED BY GOVERNOR DEWEY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of our State, Governor Dewey, has asked for almost unprecedented powers during this so-called emergency. The powers that he asks for are almost fantastic and unbelievable. He would arrogate unto himself all judicial, legislative, and executive functions in the State of New York. He would not wait until there was an actual war or an invasion. He wants those powers now. A legislature would go berserk if it would grant any governor such powers. They would be an unwarranted interference with Federal authority and run athwart the jurisdiction of the Office of Defense Mobilization, the National Production Authority, the Economic Stabilization Agency, the National Defense Manpower Authority, the Civil Defense Administration. The Governor wants to conscript labor and confiscate property. He wants to ration foods and services. He wants to allocate scarce materials and grant priorities. He wants to do everything that was done during the war by Federal authority, but he wants authority to do it now.

His regulations which could be issued without restraint would have the effect of law and violations thereof would incur severe penalties, including jail.

Governor Dewey might honestly believe such authority should reside in him. But even hell is paved with good intentions. Such grant of power would offend against the Federal Constitution and the New York State Constitution.

He and a figurehead defense council of 23, he would in the main appoint, could supersede all mayors, county commissioners, and local officers. The latter might well resign. While he supposedly would work and confer with this council, it would be his own personal agency. He could act without this council if it were, for example, not practical to have it assemble. While this council would include members of his cabinet, as it were, they are all his political henchmen. Disobedience to Dewey orders could mean dismissal as far as all nonelective State officials are concerned.

So adverse and hostile was the reception accorded Dewey's proposals that even he was forced to pause. He asked a 30-day waiting period.

I do not relish setting up Dewey as a sort of satrap. His ideas should be banished to limbo.

ARMING WESTERN GERMANY

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an Associated Press article, under date of December 24, 1950, Hannover, Germany, which will be found at page 185 of last Friday's RECORD, stating, among other things, this:

> A magazine's poll of its German readers showed today that a large majority opposes West German rearmament.
> On the question of whether Western Germany should join the North Atlantic Defense Pact, 81.5 percent said "No."

If we attempt to arm Germany with that kind of a set-up will it not result in a dangerous and unwise policy? As a matter of fact, will it not become, and is it not, in fact, an impossibility to accomplish this policy? I ask your consideration of this question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

COMMUNISM IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WOOD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include in my remarks a treatise on communism prepared by a high-school class of Chestatee High School, located in the congressional district I serve.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Un-American Activities several years ago prepared for publication and release a series of educational publications entitled "One Hundred Things You Should Know About Communism." These pamphlets deal with communism in the United States of America, government, labor, education, and religion. Hundreds of thousands of these publications have been distributed throughout the United States. The value of these publications as an educational document is demonstrated by the fact that the school system of Harlan County, Ky., had adopted the series of One Hundred Things You Should Know About Communism as a text in sociology and other classes.

Prof. Elbert C. Harris, principal of the Chestatee High School, Gainesville, Ga., has adopted these publications for study by a class in communism. Professor Harris has submitted to me a paper prepared by the students of the Chestatee High School after studying communism for only 4½ months.

Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House who reads this paper on communism should be deeply gratified by the part he has played in making this document available in order that people might learn the true aims, purposes, and operations of communism. A nation possessing knowledge of this international conspiracy cannot be duped by the propaganda of the Communist Party.

I feel a sense of deep personal pride in being permitted to represent such splendid, upstanding American citizens as compose this fine class in this rural high school in Georgia.

COMMUNISM

Communism is a system by which a comparatively small group of people is trying to rule the whole world. Today it is a world force which governs millions of the human race, and threatens the safety of the democratic, Christian nations of the world. It is seeking to gain control of education, religion, labor, government, and the whole thinking process of humanity from the cradle to the grave either by legal or illegal methods. Conspiracy and iron force are the basic tools of communism, and it works both inside and outside the law and constitution of the nation of which it seeks to gain control.

In Communist-controlled countries the party operates the government, industries, schools, hospitals, labor, homes, and the work and play of the people from birth till death. The party enjoys the profits of the countries controlled and the enslaved peoples pay the bills.

Christian living, under communism, is horribly punished. Belief in God is outlawed. God and Christian living are marked as enemies, and Communists attack them with all the force they possess, because they know God, Christianity, democracy, and communism can never exist side by side; and when they do not dominate by force, they seek to dominate by deception and corruption from within just as they do in government, education, labor, and in general throughout the entire life of the nation. They know communism can never completely control the mind and the body, which is their aim, so long as people have an abiding faith in God. This is why they so persistently persecute the churches, belief in God, and all forms of Christianity. The only hope for religious training under communism is that parents teach their children at home in secrecy.

Since all property belongs to the government in Communist-controlled countries, there is no private initiative. Laborers are compelled to work where they are told, when they are told, how they are told, and at whatever wage the government designates, and this without question. Complete subordination is demanded and obtained. No one is free. No labor union, even, can be free. They deal with the future of your job, your security, the conditions under which you work, union membership, if any, and one's whole life which makes it impossible to live the life of a free citizen.

In the field of education the child is no longer free under Communist domination. Children are forced to attend schools of Communist selection which are completely dominated and controlled by them and in which the teachers are continually watched by their spies. In these schools the children are taught the nonexistence of God. The children are taken early in life, put into uniform with a hammer and sickle flag in one hand and a gun in the other, and sent forth to conquer the whole world for the Red flag of Russia. They are taught to spy upon their parents at home and to report to the authorities any breach of Communist doctrine.

The child comes from these schools and colleges with anything except a mind of his own. He is trained, but not educated. He only knows to obey unquestionably and to solve only the problems handed him, and to consider it a heinous crime to even think for himself. He is only a child-man of communism when his training—not education—is completed.

Should communism take over in the United States today, the education which American boys and girls are receiving would stop immediately and Communist training begin, training to do a particular thing and do it well without any consideration for the ideals of the individual whatever.

Communists consider themselves actually at war with every individual and every nation that does not take its orders from Moscow, and the United States of America is no exception. The leopard never changes his spots. Our country today is being attacked from within and without. Communism has already made its inroads into key Government positions, the Army, the Navy, diplomatic corps, the Treasury, and other capital point of Government to say nothing of its inroads into labor unions, schools, churches, and other patriotic organizations.

We are apparently asleep as individuals to the danger which America is facing in this crucial hour of Communist deception and intrigue. Every citizen owes it to himself, his country, and his God to awake and acquaint himself with the minutest details of his danger. None of us is safe so long as Communists and communism lurk in even the remotest corners of this Nation.

Let us, as true Americans, wake up, individually, inform ourselves and others of the danger we are facing, arm ourselves with knowledge, equip ourselves with zeal and determination, and fight communism in all its forms; and wherever found, until the last vestige of its curse is forever erased from this good land of freedom.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes today, after the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered, and I further ask that my remarks may follow the reading of the President's message on the budget.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Wednesday following the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

POWER OF PRESIDENT TO SEND TROOPS ABROAD

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, once again there arises in the House of Representatives concern with the constitutional problem of the implied powers of the Executive. The obvious expression of this concern is the Coudert resolution. This analogous situation arises, however, when the means to this end devised by the gentleman from New York begs another constitutional question having to do with the power of Congress to forbid the ordering of the Armed Forces overseas.

I do not object to the House concerning itself with foreign policy. I think the increasing interest shown by the House in such matters is one of the healthiest developments in the Congress in the last 25 years. As a matter of fact, I have always been a leading advocate of the right of the House to act on treaties—that treaties be ratified by a single majority of both Houses of Congress.

Section 8, article I of the Constitution is, of course, the basis for the existence of the legislative weapon in all controversy with the Executive of this nature—"the power of the purse" and clearly is with reference to the resolution in question for there also is to be found the power of Congress to raise and maintain troops.

I take it for granted that no one seriously contends that, as the law now stands, the President does not have the power to send troops out of the country, in certain cases.

The House has time and again stated its willingness to listen to the advice of the Chiefs of the Armed Forces on all matters of troop disposition for the national defense. I believe the Executive has done so and will do so. That being the case, the Executive would hardly act under implied power unless after the advice of the Defense Chiefs in the interest of the national security, and if that is so, very few Members of Congress would care to superimpose their contrary opinion. Why then, other than for academic reasons, select this hour for a vitriolic and tumultuous debate as to "which comes first, the chicken or the egg."

In view of the long series of precedents of the implied power of the President with reference to the dispatch of troops to foreign soil, the Coudert resolution amounts to a request for a vote of lack of confidence in the Executive during a period of grave national emergency—and if that is the purpose—I challenge the gentleman to unmask his attack and introduce a resolution which asks such a vote and let that issue be met head-on.

It is clear that the resolution is an attempt to give legislative voice to certain of the arguments of Mr. Hoover's recent statement on foreign policy. Consequently, this resolution could be the vehicle for a full dress debate in the House on foreign policy rather than that of violent constitutional and jurisdictional issues between the legislative and the executive, but that is a forlorn hope if one recalls the history of such debates down through the pages of our history.

There is no basis for the assumption that in advance of aggression the President would not ask the approval of Congress to send additional troops to Europe.

In the face of world events there is no margin for error. All doubts must be resolved against the creation of a constitutional crisis at this time.

Soviet imperialism, which seeks the enslavement of the whole world, could be granted no more precious boon than the adoption of a policy by this Congress which would paralyze American armed strength outside the United States, reduce our foreign policy to a tragic absurdity and deliver the remains of the free world into the ravenous maws of Moscow.

The mere suggestion that the American giant be bound hand and foot at an hour when the fate of this Nation and the democratic world hangs in the balance is illustrative of the crisis of faith that afflicts us in so many quarters. Allowing for the very best intentions of the authors of such proposals, and knowing full well their patriotism, nevertheless the stern fact remains that the course advocated by the Coudert resolution and similar legislative proposals in this House, would deliver victory to the Soviets by default. Such a course would shame the name of America down through the ages and would represent the abnegation of everything this Republic holds dear and valid.

What makes such a proposal all the more disserviceable to the United States is that it comes at an hour when our democratic friends in far parts of the world, under the menacing shadows of aggressive communism, are looking to us for moral support, material assistance, and visible signs that the champion of the free world, America, will not abandon them to vicious appetites of Russian expansionism.

At this very hour what is needed more than anything else is firm and eloquent reaffirmation on our part that all of the resources of the United States, moral, physical, and spiritual, will be found totally in this fight for survival—and it is nothing but a fight for survival for Soviet imperialism is insatiable and is a victim of its own dynamism.

Under direct authority of the Constitution the President is charged with the responsibility of the conduct of foreign policy. Certainly this duty and responsibility would become a nullity if he were not permitted, in the national interest, to implement such policies by forces adequate to enforce them.

Down through our history there is precedent after precedent for the Chief Executive acting quickly and directly in committing our Armed Forces to action in the national interest. In this connection, Edward S. Corwin, the recognized expert in this field, in his volume The President: Office and Powers, dealing with the Presidency from 1787 to 1948 has this to say on this subject:

> But the President may also make himself the direct administrator of the international rights and duties of the United States, or of what are adjudged by him to be such, without awaiting action either by the treaty-making power or by Congress, or by the courts.

One President after another has availed himself of his prerogative.

Upward of 140 separate instances of such direct Presidential action are cited in James Grafton Rogers' volume entitled "World Politics and the Constitution." They start with the undeclared naval war with France from 1798 to 1800, down through Caribbean engagements from 1814 to 1825, including the Barbary wars, various landing of marines in numbers in many countries, military encounters with Mexico, naval demonstrations of Commodore Perry against Japan, military action against China in 1854, again in 1855 and 1856, numerous actions against South American countries, incidents in Korea in 1871, and again in 1888, and so on down to the action taken in connection with the Philippine Insurrection in 1899–1901.

During the first three decades of the twentieth century at least a score of such direct military engagements were taken in the protection of American interests in the international field by direct authority vested in the Presidential office. Similarly in the years from 1940 through 1941 this country undertook a series of vital steps, geared to foreign policy and in the national interest, upon Presidential initiative, including the exchange of destroyers for British bases, the United States occupation of Greenland, the occupation of Iceland. Not the least of such steps was the Presidential order to the Navy to patrol ship lanes to Europe in an effort to check the Nazi submarine menace.

The record in this respect is clear and beyond question. It behooves us in the face of the perils which confront our security to remember this record and not reduce our chances for survival to academic considerations which certainly are weak reeds to lean upon when the Soviets possess the apparent capabilities to ravage our homeland with scientific agents of warfare.

Let it be noted that all actions taken in regard to commitment of our Armed Forces abroad are not done abritrarily or capriciously but only after the most serious and profound consideration and upon the advice of our military and congressional leaders and in consultation with the State Department.

The prime objective of Soviet diplomacy at this moment is to drive a wedge into the unity of America and her allies. At one fell swoop the activation of the philosophy of the Coudert resolution would accomplish this and the Kremlin would be saved any further trouble. The free world would fall apart to await isolation and devouring, piece by piece.

What is incomprehensible to me is that in this day of undeclared war, when science has annihilated time and space, when atomic warfare in all its fury can be launched without warning in the middle of the night, is that responsible citizens would advocate a policy which must perforce assent to a degree of destruction that might well be fatal before our Nation could take steps to begin its fight for life.

No, our good judgment must not be swallowed up in the quicksand of fear. We must not be rigid or unimaginative and helpless before menacing forces. This crisis, created by Soviet imperialism, cannot be postponed by equivocation. It cannot be solved by wishful thinking.

Shall we, America, the font of liberty, truly the "home of the brave," run away from the struggle where the forces of history are being brought together? No, this is the road to national disgrace and ruin. It would be the crime of the centuries for America in this hour of great decision to be craven and cowardly.

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S PROPOSAL

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, every once in a while the Members are greatly shocked. That was my condition this morning when the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] made that terrific attack upon Governor Dewey.

If I understood what the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] was saying, it was that Governor Dewey of New York was asking for dictatorial power to do in the State of New York the very things which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has over the years insisted should be entrusted, first to the then President Roosevelt; later, to President Truman.

A grant of arbitrary power equal to that possessed by a dictator carried no terror to the heart of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] if that power was granted to a Democratic President, to an internationalist, to a so-called liberal, or one socialistically inclined.

One uninformed, listening to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] a few moments ago, would be terrified by the picture of what might happen if, perchance, similar powers were granted to a Republican Governor in the gentleman's home State of New York.

The gentleman is frightened, he is terrified, at the mere thought that a governor of one of the 48 States—a so-called Republican—and I use that word advisedly—should even venture to ask for powers within his home State equal to those which the gentleman has insisted must be granted to a President—provided he is a so-called Democrat—and again I use that term advisedly—if the Republic is to be saved.

When a New Dealer, packaged under the label "Democrat" or an internationalist, whether that label be Democrat or Republican—asks for support for a blank check, either on the Treasury or for authority, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], in his support is as busy as a hen in a dust heap—if you know what I mean.

But let one who is a conservative, a nationalist, make a request for a little bit of either and the gentleman throws a fit.

For myself, I am not in favor of giving blank checks to anyone.

The old Constitution with its three checks on absolute power in any one branch of the Government is still my guide.

ENLISTMENT OF GERMANS AND JAPANESE IN UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced legislation authorizing the enlistment of Germans and Japanese in the United States Army. I want to make it perfectly clear that I said in "the Army of the United States," not in the army of the United Nations or of any other nation, but our own Army.

From day to day I want to call attention to some of the numerous and varied reasons for such enlistments. Today I direct your attention particularly to the need of manpower in the labor field of this country. I have just come from a meeting that has been discussing the shortage of agricultural labor. It is generally recognized that we cannot expect to make and harvest a crop as large as seems desirable for 1951 without additional supplies of farm labor. Instead of expecting more farm labor this year it seems clear that we shall have less. Not only are the armed services reducing our farm labor supply, defense industries are going to take more and more of the supply of labor that remains on the farm.

Shortages of labor are going to break out in every field of endeavor in the United States during the coming year, and all of us realize that. We all know that we will be short of labor in our field and in our factories and we know that the products of these fields and factories are absolutely essential to our military effort. Why are we overlooking the fact that our present policy of allowing none but 100 percent physically perfect specimens of young American manhood to serve in our Armed Forces is going in the long run to leave these very forces without adequate supplies.

At best we are going to have to take enough of our American boys. Why should we not at least allow the citizens of Germany and of Japan to have a part in defending their particular sections of the world? We do not have to give them American citizenship or promise them the kind of benefits we extend to American boys. We need only to give them the opportunity to eat American army food and wear American army clothing. A place in the American Army is still a better job than is available to millions of Germans and millions of Japanese, and every German and Japanese who enlists in our Army reduces by one our need to take an American boy out of production either on a farm or in a factory.

The advantages of such enlistments are obvious. What serious objection can be offered?

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. TABER asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

SOUVENIRS OF THE WHITE HOUSE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, out in the lobby there is a card on which are placed samples of souvenirs that may be had of the White House. As will be recalled, about a year ago I mentioned the fact there would be some 800,000 pieces of the gutted White House available for our constituents if they desired them. I have been advised that our colleague the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] made announcement of this on Friday last and that his remarks appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day.

WE SHOULD BRING OUR BOYS HOME FROM KOREA, STAY OUT OF EUROPE, GET OUT OF THE SO-CALLED UNITED NATIONS, BUILD UP OUR OWN DEFENSES, AND STRENGTHEN OUR OWN COUNTRY TO WHERE NO OTHER NATION WILL DARE ATTACK US

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being called an isolationist by those wild-eyed internationalists who seem to be bent on dragging our country to destruction, I feel it my duty as a Member of this Congress to express my honest convictions relative to the grave problems with which we are now confronted.

First. We should bring our boys home from Korea. They never should have been sent there in the first place. There was no law for it; Congress had not declared war.

I am not in favor of permitting the President of the United States to send our boys all over the world to fight the other fellow's wars, especially when war has not been declared by the Congress of the United States, as the Constitution requires.

Second. I am in favor of getting out of Europe and staying out of Europe.

Third. I am also for getting out of the so-called United Nations, which has proved to be a farce, a fraud, and a failure.

It has attempted to interfere with our internal affairs, subordinate the American people to the domination of foreign powers, and has declared wars, or emergencies, for us to fight and pay for, while the very countries, whose representatives have so voted, have not turned their hands to help.

We have already suffered more casualties in Korea than we suffered in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the war with Mexico, and the Spanish-American War, all combined, and the chances are that if we do not get out of there, we will lose a million men before it is over, and accomplish nothing.

Let us get out of Asia, bring our boys home, stay out of Europe, build up our own defenses, including the strongest Air Force on earth with an ample supply of atomic bombs, with such radar and naval facilities as are necessary to protect this continent, and to enforce the Monore Doctrine, then communism in Europe will collapse of its own weight.

In that way, we can develop the strongest country on earth, and lead the world by precept and example into a new day of peace, progress, and prosperity.

But, we cannot do it by bribery, with money taken from the pockets of the overburdened taxpayers of America, nor can we force the rest of the world to it with a bayonet.

We have just gone through one war which untold millions of people have already called the most useless war in history. Our boys won the fight, and then the powers that be turned the victory over to the worst enemy civilization has ever known.

If we continue to follow this course, I fear that our country will not survive.

But we can survive and lead the world by following the course which I have suggested.

Let us build up our own country, let us build up our own strength, let us build up our own Nation, then communism in Europe will fall of its own weight and we can protect our country and pass it down to posterity.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMPOSITION OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 67) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the Eighty-second Congress the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall be composed of 24 members.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMPOSITION OF VARIOUS STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 68) and ask for its immediate consideration.

Ross Adair, Indiana; Allan Oakley Hunter, California; William L. Springer, Illinois; Winston L. Prouty, Vermont; Harmar D. Denny, Jr., Pennsylvania.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BUDGET, 1952—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 17)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith my recommendations for the budget of the United States Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952.

This is a budget for our national security in a period of grave danger.

It calls for expenditures of 71.6 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1952—a total 78 percent above expenditures for the year which ended last June 30. That increase is one measure of the vast new responsibilities thrust upon the American people by the Communist assaults upon freedom in Asia and the threats to freedom in other parts of the world.

BUDGET TOTALS

	1950 actual	1951 estimated	1952 estimated
Receipts (excluding proposed new tax legislation)	$37.0	$44.5	$55.1
Expenditures	40.1	47.2	71.6
Deficit	−3.1	−2.7	−16.5

The new emphasis on military preparedness reflects the necessities of the world situation today. It reflects no shift of purpose. Our purpose remains to secure and strengthen peace. We are determined to seek peace by every honorable means—mindful of our responsibility to ourselves, to our friends and allies, and to humanity everywhere to spare the world the tragedy of another world war. We are likewise determined to spare ourselves and the world the even deeper tragedy of the surrender of justice and freedom.

Another system—powerful in resources, hostile in intent, and ruthless in method—is seeking the destruction of all the values we would preserve. That system is under the mastery of men unrestrained by considerations of responsibility to their people and guided by twisted dogma. They can be restrained only if defensive strength is arrayed against them. Our best hope now is to build our strength to the point necessary to bring them to caution, if not to wisdom. We are compelled to make the creation of strength a paramount aim.

In our drive to build up our defenses, we and the countries associated with us have a twofold goal—first, military forces strong enough to provide a powerful deterrent to those who may be contemplating new aggression; second, readiness for immediate mobilization of all our power if that becomes necessary.

This Budget reflects our determination.

First, it incorporates our expenditures for military purposes—to build swiftly an active force of highly trained men, equipped with the most modern weapons, and supported by ready reserves of men, supplies, and equipment.

Second, it includes our expenditures to help other threatened nations rebuild their strength and to participate with them in a program of mutual aid and common defense.

Third, it embodies our Government programs for the expansion of productive capacity and the concentration of needed capacity on defense requirements—at the expense where necessary of normal civilian purposes.

Fourth, it contains expenditures for programs which will maintain and develop our national strength over the long run, keeping in mind that the present emergency may be of long duration and we must therefore be prepared for crises in the more distant as well as in the immediate future.

Fifth, it reflects reductions in other expenditures, in order to divert a maximum of resources to the overriding requirements of national security.

As a sixth budgetary measure, I shall shortly recommend an increase in tax revenues in the conviction that we must attain a balanced budget to provide a sound financial basis for what may be an extended period of very high defense expenditures.

CONTENTS OF THE BUDGET

The accompanying comparative table shows projected expenditures for the major programs or functions of the Government for the fiscal year 1952, revised estimates for the current year, and actual expenditures for the year which ended last June 30. Estimated appropriations and other new obligational authority for 1952 are also shown. Differences between obligational authority and expenditures are accounted for by the fact that obligational authority granted in one fiscal year may be spent in part in subsequent fiscal years.

The table covers expenditures from general and special funds of the Treasury, plus net expenditures of wholly owned Government corporations. The estimates include requirements under proposed as well as existing legislation. Expenditures from trust funds are excluded from this table, but operations of the major trust funds are discussed in subsequent sections of the Budget Message.

The requirements of national security are reflected in every major function of the Budget. The entire Government is being redirected to meet the compelling demands of national security, and each functional category includes activities which support, directly or indirectly, the defense effort.

The two largest categories—military services and international security and foreign relations—are devoted in their entirety to the broad objectives of national security. The military services category includes the costs of the Armed Forces and certain additional programs closely related to the military, particularly the stockpiling of strategic and critical materials and the activities of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. Under the international security and foreign relations heading are the costs of weapons provided to our North Atlantic Treaty allies and to other free nations, as well as expenditures for economic assistance and for the expanded international information program.

The military and international categories account for expenditures of 41.4 and 7.5 billion dollars, respectively, in the fiscal year 1952. Together they total 48.9 billions, or nearly 69 percent of the total Budget.

This total is an increase of 90 percent over the 25.7 billion dollars estimated as expenditures for these purposes during the current year—accounted for almost wholly by the great expansion of the military procurement program.

Our military requirements are of several kinds. We must maintain and supply our forces fighting in Korea. We must provide modern equipment for the expansion of our Army, Navy, and Air Force to the present combined goal of nearly three and a half million men. We must provide equipment for training purposes and for the civilian components not on active duty. We must provide military items to our allies as an essential part of our own defense. We must build a production base and matériel reserves against the contingency of full-scale war.

These demands do not press evenly on all sectors of defense production. In some areas, large supplies of military items remain from the recent war and reduce the need for new large-scale production. Our reserve naval fleet, for example, is an asset which reduces sharply the need for mass construction of new warships. In some cases, the record-breaking military production of the war years has left us with reserves of productive capacity. In other cases present capacity is far from adequate. The economic mobilization program will therefore be selective in character—in some areas, an all-out drive, with extensive conversion of civilian capacity; in other areas, a comparatively small expansion of present production rates.

At the same time that we sharply increase our own military production, Canada and the Western European nations with whom we are allied under the North Atlantic Treaty will be making comparable efforts. Nations outside the North Atlantic organization, including our neighbors in Latin America, are also making important contributions to the common security. Our international programs recognize that this Nation's own security is directly related to the security and defensive strength of our allies and that equipment and materials supplied to help arm their forces or to support their military production are, in fact, additions to our own defensive strength.

Figures shown in this Budget for both the military and the international security programs may be subject to substantial adjustment as the defense program progresses. Detailed estimates of new obligational authority for these categories are not included in the Budget at this time, in order to permit more thorough programing of specific requirements. Actual expenditures will depend on how rapidly we are able to produce the military items for which funds are made available.

A defense program of the size now being undertaken must be suported by a strong and expanding economic base. Five major categories of Federal programs contribute directly to this economic base. These are: (1) finance, commerce, and industry; (2) labor; (3) transportation and communication; (4) natural resources; and (5) agriculture and agricultural resources. Together these categories make up 7.4 billion dollars of expenditures in the fiscal year 1952, or 10 percent of the Budget.

This total compares to 5.7 billion dollars estimated as expenditures for these purposes in the current fiscal year. The increase reflects primarily our programs to expand private production facilities through Federal action, to administer economic controls, and to add capacity for atomic energy activities.

Four other categories of Budget expenditures include programs which contribute to national strength through protecting and improving the health, education, and well-being of the individuals and families who make up the Nation. These classifications are: (1) housing and community development; (2) education and general research; (3) social security, welfare, and health; and (4) veterans' services and benefits.

These four categories account for a total of 7.9 billion dollars, or 11 percent of Budget expenditures in the fiscal year 1952. This represents a reduction of nearly a billion dollars from the current year's anticipated expenditures. If it were not for the major new programs of civil defense and defense housing, community facilities, and services, the total reduction would be even greater.

The general operations of Government—including the legislative and judicial branches and such general activities of the executive branch as tax collection, civil-service retirement payments, and central supply, records, and buildings services—amount to 1.4 billion dollars, or 2 percent of the 1952 Budget. Apart from the expected costs of dispersal of Government agencies, this group of expenditures is also scheduled to decline from the 1951 level.

Interest payments will amount to an estimated 5.9 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1952, or 8 percent of the total Budget.

In order that our resources can be diverted to meet the demands of national security, strict economy in nondefense spending is required. Such a policy is incorporated in this Budget. For example, the only major new public works projects included in the Budget are those directly necessary to the defense effort. Construction on many public works projects now under way has been substantially curtailed. Many other activities are being contracted. Expenditures for the maintenance of Government property have been held to a minimum consistent with protection of Government investments. Cost increases, such as the rise that has already taken place in the prices of what the Government buys, are in many instances being absorbed by the agencies through compensating economies. Increases have been allowed where increasing work loads must be met or where further accumulation of backlogs of work cannot be tolerated, but only to the extent that the work cannot be taken care of through increased efficiency or reductions in service standards.

MANAGEMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT'S PROGRAM

Direction of the Nation's security program in this critical period will require the highest degree of administrative effectiveness in the Federal Government. Concerted efforts are being made to strengthen the organization and management of the executive branch for the extraordinarily difficult tasks that lie ahead. During the coming period, we must be able to make quickly such changes in the assignment of governmental functions as are needed to carry out national security programs. Under the Defense Production Act, I have by Executive order created the Office of Defense Mobilization, the Defense Production Administration, the Economic Stabilization Agency, and other emergency agencies with extensive delegation of authority. However, authority under that act covers only a part of the range of defense functions. During World Wars I and II the President was given emergency reorganization powers. These powers were extensively used to keep Government organization continuously in line with mobilization needs. Such authority for temporary changes is needed in the current emergency and should be one of the early measures considered by the Congress.

In addition to concentrating on the organization and management of the defense program, I shall continue to emphasize throughout the Government the management improvement program, instituted in 1949 to achieve greater efficiency in all Federal activities.

The last Congress took many important legislative actions aimed at improving governmental administration. Other actions are, however, still required. Some of these measures I shall incorporate in reorganization plans to be submitted to the Congress under the Reorganization Act of 1949. Others require legislation, including such important matters as improvements in the civil-service system and in the administration of the postal service.

The actions in the field of organization and management which we have taken in the past years have increased the ability of the Government to deal with a major defense effort. We must continue to make progress in this field.

PAYING THE COSTS OF DEFENSE

When the American people resolved to undertake the defense program now under way, they accepted also the necessity for the increases in their taxes that the new level of expenditures requires. National security in the present world can be attained only with direct and heavy cost to each one of us.

High taxes are indispensable to our successful mobilization. They are required to preserve confidence in the integrity of the Government's finances, to distribute the heavy financial costs of defense fairly among all the people, to reduce excessive demand for raw materials and industrial products required for national defense, and to choke off inflationary pressures. We cannot as a nation buy a defense establishment of the size that is now being constructed and still as individuals expect to spend our money to the same degree as before for normal peacetime purposes. Unless positive action is taken on the tax front, our defense effort will be in continuous jeopardy.

The tax legislation passed last year substantially increased our revenues. The Revenue Act of 1950, approved within 3 months after the invasion of the Republic of Korea, increased income taxes on individuals and corporations and closed some loopholes in the income tax laws. The corporation excess profits tax, passed in the final week of the Eighty-first Congress, also increased our revenues while at the same time placing the higher levies upon those businesses which can best afford to pay increased taxes.

In spite of these new tax measures, a deficit of 16.5 billion dollars is estimated for the fiscal year 1952 if no further tax legislation is enacted. At this time, sound public finance and fiscal policy require that we balance the Budget. I shall shortly transmit to the Congress recommendations for new revenue legislation.

Even a balanced budget will not of itself serve to keep our economy stable during a period of rapidly rising defense expenditures. The full amount of inflationary pressure is not measured by the budget deficit alone, since this reflects only payments actually made. The Department of Defense alone will have been granted for the fiscal years 1951 and 1952 an estimated 112 billion dollars of obligational authority for its military functions, and additional amounts will have been made available for foreign military-aid programs. Bidding for manpower and materials, which pushes prices upward, begins as soon as procurement contracts to be paid from these authorizations are signed, even though expenditures may not take place for a year or more. Other positive stabilization measures, including allocations, and credit, price and wage controls, are essential to offset the inflationary pressures which are not reflected in the single figure of the budget deficit.

The following table provides a breakdown of anticipated budget receipts during the fiscal year 1952, based on existing legislation, compared with actual receipts during the fiscal year 1950 and revised estimated receipts for the current year.

NOTE.—Includes only receipts under existing legislation.

Under existing legislation, including the recently enacted tax measures budget receipts for the fiscal year 1952 are estimated at 55.1 billion dollars. This is 10.6 billion dollars higher than the estimate for the current year. Receipts from direct taxes on corporations show the greatest increase, 6.4 billion dollars over corresponding receipts for the current fiscal year. The combined effects of the Revenue Act of 1950, the Excess Profits Tax Act, and peak levels of corporate profits are reflected in this estimate. Direct taxes on individuals increase 4.4 billion dollars as a result of the high levels of income anticipated and a full year of operation under the Revenue Act of 1950. Although the collections from certain excise taxes will decline as production of some manufactured goods is affected by shortages of materials, receipts from other exises and all other major sources will increase.

BORROWING AND PUBLIC DEBT

At the beginning of the current fiscal year the public debt stood at 257.4 billion dollars. The debt will rise to approximately 260 billion dollars by June 30, 1951, as a reflection of the financing of the budget deficit for the current fiscal year. The amount of the increase in debt beyond June 30, 1951, depends upon the extent to which the projected deficit for the fiscal year 1952 is reduced through the enactment of additional tax legislation.

PROGRAMS

The following sections outline in more detail the character and extent of the programs which are to be financed from this Budget. Further detailed descriptions of the programs of the Government, as well as certain special analyses covering public works, grants to State and local governments, investment and operating expenditures, and Federal credit programs, are included elsewhere in the Budget.

MILITARY SERVICES

The free nations of the world will continue to seek settlement of international disagreements peaceably and honorably within the framework of the United Nations—but they will rebuild their defenses rapidly. The communist attacks in Korea have served notice upon us all that the Soviet rulers are willing to risk the peace of the world to carry out their ambitions.

In response to the grave common peril, the free world is now moving forward, with increasing speed, determination, and unity, to build powerful defenses. This mutual effort is required both to deter further communist aggression and to insure that we shall emerge victorious if war is thrust upon us.

This Nation, as the strongest member of the free world, must provide the leadership in this great undertaking by developing its own military forces and, at the same time, assisting the other free nations on a large scale, in order to quickly achieve adequate mutual defenses.

The recommended program for building our own military strength is discussed in this section. The program for assisting other free nations in developing their strength is discussed under international security and foreign relations.

Department of Defense.—One year ago, I proposed a military program for the fiscal year 1951 based on active forces totaling about 1.5 million men and women, in a state of relative readiness, and backed by a moderate rate of military production and a substantial level of research and development.

The communist attacks in Korea and the imminent possibility of further attacks elsewhere have already caused us to quadruple the budget for the Department of Defense. To the initial enactment of 13.3 billion dollars in new obligational authority for the fiscal year 1951, including nearly a billion dollars of prior year authorizations made available, the Congress has in the past 6 months added 28.7 billion dollars. In this Budget I am tentatively including an additional 10 billion dollars of obligational authority. This will make a total of 52 billion dollars for the fiscal year 1951.

Because of the extensive planning involved, I am not submitting detailed 1952 estimates for the Department of Defense at this time. The Budget includes, however, an over-all estimate of 60 billion dollars, which is expected to be the approximate total of new obligational authority requested this spring for the fiscal year 1952.

The expenditure estimates for the military functions of the Department of Defense are also tentative. At the present time expenditures of 20 billion dollars are estimated for the fiscal year 1951 and 40 billion dollars for 1952.

[1] This column excludes 2,702 million dollars of recommended appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authority.

The increased funds for fiscal years 1951 and 1952 will serve four major interrelated purposes. First, they will support the current increase in the strength of our active forces; second, they will finance the military production program designed to produce rapidly the modern equipment needed to supply our forces; third, they will provide reserves of equipment for still larger United States forces should these become necessary; and, fourth, they will help us to develop the production capacity of the country to the point where we could move rapidly to full mobilization should the need arise.

Six months ago our active military forces numbered less than one and a half million men and women. They have already been increased by about a million and this Budget includes funds to reach and maintain our present goal of nearly a million more.

We also have now available for rapid mobilization more than two million men and women in the National Guard and the Reserves of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. The Budget provides funds to increase the strength and degree of readiness of these Reserve organizations.

While the exact size and disposition of our active forces by units and geographic location must be kept secret in times like the present, in general we are increasing rapidly the number of active units. In the Army, we have called to active duty several National Guard divisions and reactivated certain regular divisions. We shall soon have a force more than twice as strong as our pre-Korea Army. In the Navy, by continuing to reactivate ships from the "moth-ball" fleet, we shall soon raise the active fleet to a strength more than 50 percent above that of a year ago. This Budget provides for maintaining two full Marine divisions plus additional separate units. In the Air Force, we are expanding the structure from 48 to 84 air wings; these will be rapidly brought up to full strength in trained men, and additional wings will be added.

The expansion of the active forces is reflected in the Budget not only in larger total amounts for pay and allowances, but also in increased funds for housing, training, and maintaining such forces.

We are now establishing training centers, bases, and camps for the enlarged forces. Furthermore, in order to prepare for the possibility of further mobilization, we shall be opening facilities with sufficient capacity to handle larger active forces than our immediate goals require. This Budget will provide, therefore, for a considerable increase in military public works expenditures—primarily to expand and improve troop training centers and air bases.

By far the largest part of the funds requested for the military services will be used to procure modern equipment. We have large stocks of some types of equipment, such as rifles and naval ships, which need only to be taken from storage and, in some cases, modernized. But in many other types, such as planes, tanks, electronic equipment, recoilless weapons, and rockets, we need to put into rapid production new models incorporating basic improvements that have been made since the end of World War II. This means a major production effort in order to obtain the best and most modern equipment for our enlarged active forces and for large reserve stocks.

This effort will require prompt and accurate planning and scheduling of military procurement and production in order to anticipate and forestall potential bottlenecks in materials, manpower, or facilities. For example, schedules must be laid out for producing the many complicated components of modern military airplanes, such as jet engines and electronic fire-control equipment, so that the components can be brought together as smoothly and efficiently as possible into finished aircraft. Some delays and frictions will inevitably occur in a production program as large and urgent as that upon which we are now embarked. But the experience and teamwork of military and civilian officials, of private businessmen and workers, will produce results very rapidly.

At the same time that the output of military equipment is stepped up, a base is being developed for moving to full-scale mobilization if the need should arise. For this reason, military orders are being spread among suppliers, instead of being concentrated in a few large firms. Production lines will be set up and manufacturers will be made familiar with our production needs over and above the immediate necessities of our present procurement plans. In this way, military production can be increased still further on short notice if that becomes necessary.

For example, we expect to develop an aircraft industry that will be capable of turning out 50,000 planes in a year, even though we will not be actually procuring that many. These planes, on the average, will be approximately 50 percent heavier than those used in World War II. Similarly, we shall organize to produce 35,000 tanks in a year, although we are not ordering that many now. This means, of course, planning for the readiness of basic materials, manpower, and components, as well as final assembly lines.

The process of putting military equipment into production will not stop or retard our research and development work. On the contrary, we shall increase our efforts to maintain superiority in all kinds of weapons and equipment. Expenditures for the military research and development program will amount to nearly a billion dollars in the current fiscal year. The developmental work and the production program will be planned so that our troops will be supplied with the best weapons in the world.

Stockpiling.—If full mobilization becomes necessary, larger quantities of scarce materials such as copper, chromium, cobalt, and nickel will be required immediately. Many of these scarce materials are not produced in the United States, and others cannot be produced at a rate sufficient to meet all-out military needs. We are consequently acquiring and storing large reserve stocks of these materials.

This program will be expanded and developed in accordance with our total defense needs. The controls which have been established over the use of certain of these materials will assist us in meeting our stockpile requirements. We are also participating in the development of international controls. In addition, vigorous steps are being taken, by ourselves and our allies, to expand the production of strategic and critical materials both at home and abroad.

A total of 2.9 billion dollars of new obligational authority has been made available for the stockpile program during the current fiscal year and I am requesting an additional 820 million dollars of obligational authority for fiscal year 1952. Expenditures for fiscal year 1951 are estimated at 900 million dollars and for fiscal year 1952 at 1.3 billion dollars. These estimates must be considered tentative since the stockpiling program is constantly changing in response to new developments in both requirements and supply.

Selective service.—To provide the personnel needed for the expansion and maintenance of our military strength it will be necessary to rely heavily upon continued inductions through the Selective Service System. I shall therefore shortly request the Congress to enact the necessary legislation.

National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.—The basic and applied research of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics is an essential part of our total military research program for maintaining and increasing our lead in the design of military aircraft. The spending authority recommended for this agency will provide for substantial expansion during fiscal year 1952.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AND FOREIGN RELATIONS

The combined strength of the free world, in people, in industrial capacity, and in natural resources, greatly exceeds that of the Soviet Union and its satellites. This great strength must be mobilized and organized. Most of all, it must be united in purpose. The Soviet rulers are doing their best to split apart the free nations. If the free world let that happen, we would be handing the Soviet Union a victory without a struggle.

The Soviet rulers since the last war have been devoting a very large percentage of their resources to building military forces greatly in excess of any justifiable defense requirements. If these forces should be unleashed and succeed in conquering western Europe, the Soviet rulers would more than double the industrial power now in their hands. If the Communist forces should seize other major areas of the world, the Soviet rulers would control vastly increased reservoirs of manpower and raw materials. In either case they would win new strategic bases for further aggression. The key to United States security is to join in building the free world's defenses.

In the joint effort, the citizens of other free countries, like our own citizens, will be making personal sacrifices. Each free nation must make the largest contribution it can to the mutual defense. This Nation has greater industrial strength than the rest of the free world combined, and must therefore provide assistance on a large scale to other nations working with us in the joint defense drive. This assistance will permit the other free nations to accelerate the efforts they are already making with their own resources and their own energies.

I estimate that expenditures of 7.5 billion dollars will be required for all of our international programs in the fiscal year 1952. This total will be 2.7 billion dollars more than the expenditure for international programs in each of the fiscal years 1951 and 1950. In 1952, the great preponderance of total expenditures for military and economic aid will go directly for the rapid build-up of mutual defense forces. More than one-half of total expenditures will be for procurement of military equipment to be shipped from this country to our allies. I shall request appropriations of 9.7 billion dollars for these mutual security programs, in addition to an increase of 1 billion dollars now requested in the lending ceiling of the Export-Import Bank. Actual expenditures by the Bank, in the fiscal year 1952 will, of course, be only a fraction of the increase in lending authority.

The complete request for appropriations will be presented to the Congress as soon as remaining details of the program are worked out.

In general, our assistance programs will continue to take two forms—provision of military equipment and provision of economic assistance. But the balance between these two forms of aid will shift very sharply, and will differ according to the strategic, political, and economic situation in each free world area requiring assistance.

Military and economic assistance to Europe.—The heart of our foreign policy in Europe is the North Atlantic Treaty, which was ratified by the Senate on July 21, 1949. Like all international undertakings which endure, this treaty is founded upon mutual interest. Americans know that the survival of this Nation would be gravely imperiled if the free peoples and industrial power of Western Europe were to fall under Communist subjugation. Correspondingly, the majority of Europeans are fully aware of the interdependence of their security and ours. Over the coming months, the nations of Western Europe will be calling up increasing numbers of their young men for military service. They will be diverting their resources to production of military weapons. They will be imposing additional controls on their civilian economies, particularly on civilian consumption. They will be joining with us, through the joint staff organizations which already exist, in standardizing equipment and training and in strategic and tactical planning. They are placing major elements of their forces under the unified command of the Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Powers in Europe.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization is now a going concern. It is backed by an impressive reservoir of skilled people and industrial power. It includes not only the military potential of this country and Canada, but also the combined strength of the nine European members of the North Atlantic Treaty—Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Norway, Denmark, and Portugal. These nine nations alone number altogether 175 million people, or almost as many as the Soviet Union. Iceland is also a full participant. Greece and Turkey, which within the past few years have proved their steadfastness under the threat of aggression, are closely associated with the mutual effort.

The power of all these nations, pursuing a common course under the United Nations, is being directed to the creation of highly trained and well equipped forces-in-being, and a much large mobilization base. The combined European and American forces will serve as a powerful deterrent to communist aggression in Europe. There is genuine hope, moreover, that arrangements can soon be completed for German participation in the common defense.

In order to reach the required level of combined strength in the shortest possible time, it will be necessary for the United States to give our European partners considerable assistance. The bulk of this assistance will be in the form of military equipment and supplies. We and our allies are determined that the mutual defense forces shall be equipped with modern and effective weapons. Although the European countries are undertaking to convert a substantial portion of their industries to arms production, they cannot by themselves produce rapidly enough all the complex and expensive weapons needed to arm their forces. Our tremendously productive economy must turn out many of the weapons needed to arm the European forces.

To achieve the rapid increase in European defenses that is necessary, our program of economic aid to Europe must, with a few exceptions—notably the aid program in Austria—be directed to support of the European military build-up, rather than to promoting further general economic expansion. The progress made to date under the recovery program is standing us and the entire free world in good stead in the present situation. In most European countries industry is now producing at well above prewar peaks, and this enlarged industrial strength can in substantial part be converted to military production. Moreover, the improved lot of the ordinary citizen, made possible in part by the European recovery program, has resulted in a higher degree of political cohesion and a firmer resolve to defend democracy and free institutions against aggression.

Western Europe's requirements for economic aid to support her program for building defensive forces arise directly from the disparity between her requirements for essential imports from the dollar area and her ability to earn dollars. In order to move ahead rapidly with defense plans, European countries will require materials and equipment of certain types which they can obtain only from the United States. These supplies include items essential directly in their armament factories, materials for essential consumer goods, foodstuffs, and materials for their most vital export industries. But because these countries will be diverting to rearmament a large proportion of the resources which would otherwise be engaged in producing for export, they cannot for the time being obtain, without help from us, all the dollars needed to pay for these essential dollar imports.

Much remains to be done in the mutual effort to achieve rapid strengthening of European defenses. In general, the commitments made by the European countries to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have not been large enough up to this time. But these countries share the deep new sense of urgency which recent events have given us, and these difficulties will be rapidly overcome. It must be clearly understood that the military and economic aid which I am recommending to assist European nations to rearm will be conditioned upon their carrying out their full responsibilities for building the defensive strength of the North Atlantic Treaty community. The entire free world is in grave peril. This peril can only be surmounted by arduous joint efforts, in which each nation carries out to the full its allotted responsibilities.

Assistance to other areas of the free world.—The heightened communist pressures in Asia, the Near East, and other non-European areas require that we accelerate our exsiting programs of military assistance, which now provide military equipment to certain countries which can use it effectively and are faced by internal and external communist pressures. However, in comparison with our assistance to Europe, which will be predominantly in the form of military equipment, our total program of assistance to the non-European areas of the free world must place proportionately more emphasis upon building security through helping the people and governments of these areas to solve pressing economic problems.

To varying degrees, in different parts of the non-European free world, the crucial problem in resistance to communism is the attitudes and aspirations of the people. In some of these areas, millions of people live in desperate conditions of poverty, insecurity, ill health, and illiteracy. To them communism may appear as a possible escape from unendurable conditions of life. These people must be given real faith in their future within the free world through concrete evidence that their age-old problems have been recognized and that effective steps are being taken to solve them.

In many of these countries the governments are increasingly aware of the real problem presented by the low living standards of their people and are taking such steps as they can to deal with this problem. But many of these governments do not yet have adequate numbers of trained administrators and technical and professional personnel, and lack the capital funds necessary to carry out critical developmental projects. The United States cannot close the gap between reality and aspirations with generalized economic aid, especially in the present period of extreme pressure on our economy. What we can do is to work with these people and their governments to help them solve their problems. By making available to them knowledge and skills to supplement their own, together with modest amounts of loan capital and assistance grants, we can help these governments to bring tangible benefits to their people, and achieve an increase in the unity and resource strength of the free world.

In certain other non-European areas many of the countries have more experienced governments and a better start toward economic development. In these instances, economic and technical assistance can make an important contribution by breaking economic bottlenecks. Often the necessary projects in these areas are suitable for financing through loans.

We do not propose to assist countries where the governments are not sincerely trying to improve the economic conditions of their people. Our economic and technical assistance will be granted only where it is asked for by national governments which adopt in good faith the policies necessary to make the aid effective, and to make full use of their own resources.

Our total program of economic assistance to non-European areas of the free world will make a major contribution to increasing productivity in agricultural, industrial, and extractive industries. Part of the increased output must go directly to improving living standards and public services. Another part, including raw materials and particularly strategic materials needed for the mutual defense of the free world, can be traded with the more industrialized nations for capital goods needed for further economic development.

In Asia, we are now supplying military equipment to certain nations faced by communist threats against their independence. We are also providing economic assistance to help meet urgent problems in various parts of Southeast Asia, including Indonesia, Indo-China, Burma, Thailand, and Formosa, and a developmental program in the Philippines is being inaugurated. Both military and economic aid may have to be extended to additional Asian countries, and certain present programs will have to be accelerated. In addition, we are continuing our economic assistance to Japan, which is progressing steadily toward self-support.

In the crucial Near East, we are providing military assistance, loan capital, and technical assistance. We are continuing our support of the United Nations effort to reintegrate the refugees from Palestine. Our assistance to the Near East nations is essential to build up their strength against Communist pressures.

In Africa, developmental and technical assistance programs are being carried out in the overseas territories of the Western European countries, in large part through the use of European recovery program counterpart funds. These programs, by improving living standards, will help to curb the growth of communist pressures and will bring about expanded output of vitally needed strategic materials.

In the Western Hemisphere we are joined with our Latin-American neighbors in a mutual effort to strengthen our combined defenses and to build increased economic strength. The balanced economic development of Latin America has been, and continues to be, an essential objective of American foreign policy. This policy is being supported by the public lending agencies which are providing capital for essential projects for which private financing is not available. The activities of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs in the field of technical cooperation are a demonstration of the practical value of the Point IV concept. It is essential that our lending and technical assistance activities be continued, with a special concentration of effort on projects to develop further the economic base of the Latin-American countries and to facilitate and expand the production of strategic materials vital to the free world in this emergency period.

In many of these areas, extremely important contributions to the total effort are being made by American private capital and nonprofit institutions.

The technical assistance program, administered in part by United Nations agencies, is gaining momentum in many areas, and through small expenditures is making an important contribution to productivity.

A steady outflow of loan capital for critical projects is being maintained by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Export-Import Bank. The increased need for undertakings to expand output of defense materials adds to the importance of the functions of the Export-Import Bank at this time. The Bank now has only about 500 million dollars of uncommitted lending authority. I recommend that the lending authority of the Bank be increased at this time by 1 billion dollars.

Our total program of assistance to non-European areas of the free world is making a major contribution to the ability of these areas to withstand internal and external communist pressures. The recommendations to be sent to the Congress will in part represent a continuation of these going programs, modified to take account of physical limitations of supply in this country, the increased dollar earnings of some of the areas, and the general sharpening of communist pressures.

Conduct of foreign affairs.—Effective conduct of our foreign relations takes on increasing importance in the critical world situation. The role of the diplomatic forces of the Government is of highest importance in organizing and making effective the mutual defense program. The need for a continuous flow of political and economic intelligence and the heightened tempo of activity in all aspects of international relations places a heavy burden upon the existing facilities of the Government.

This Government in cooperation with others is now organizing international machinery for dealing with world shortages of materials. In order to insure that scarce materials are used in the manner which will best serve the common defense, application of controls over international movements of certain commodities will be required. A substantial proportion of world trade will continue, however, through normal markets. In order to carry forward our long run policy of developing among the free nations workable trade patterns and a greater volume of world trade, I urge the Congress to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Through the international information and education program, we are carrying to the rest of the world the truth about our own objectives, and exposing the evil objectives of the communist conspiracy. During the fiscal year 1951, I requested, and Congress approved, a considerable expansion in this activity, including construction of additional overseas radio broadcast facilities in the United States and abroad. I intend to request from the Congress an additional appropriation of 100 million dollars for this purpose during the current fiscal year. The expanded program will result in expenditures of 57 million dollars in fiscal year 1951 and 166 million dollars in fiscal year 1952.

In order that our political, economic, and military efforts may have their maximum effect, our purposes and objectives must be made clear to all. We must promote understanding and unity among the free peoples of the world and instill hope in the hearts and minds of those who have already fallen victim to aggression. Truth is on the side of the free nations of the world. We must make full use of this advantage.

FINANCE, COMMERCE, AND INDUSTRY

In the modern world, more than ever, military strength depends on economic strength. Since World War II, the Government's programs have been directed toward achieving a strong and growing economy. The strength of our economy is now one of our greatest assets in deterring communist imperialism and in enabling us to meet military emergencies.

In the last 6 months, we have moved rapidly both to meet immediate defense requirements and to expand our capacity to produce airplanes, tanks, and other defense necessities. This has meant action by private initiative and by Government along a broad economic front. We are reopening all our reserve synthetic rubber plants. A substantial increase in steel and aluminum capacity is already well under way, and we will soon take measures to increase production of other key materials. Freight car production is being sharply increased. Expansion of both private and public power capacity is being accelerated. Mineral resources are being explored and developed both at home and abroad.

The broad authority provided under the Defense Production Act has been a major factor both in increasing the output of defense equipment and materials and in guarding against inflation and disruption of our economy. While expenditures under this authority help to finance defense-supporting programs in other functional categories, they are all shown under the finance, commerce, and industry category of the Budget. They comprise over 90 percent of the 1.5 billion dollars in expenditures estimated for this category in the fiscal year 1952.

Major provisions of the Defense Production Act expire next June 30. It is already clear that they should be not only extended but broadened in several important respects. After the Director of Defense Mobilization completes his review of the legislation that is needed, I shall transmit specific recommendations to the Congress.

Expansion of production.—The most immediate and direct stimulants to defense production are the procurement contracts of the armed services. The Department of Defense is spreading contracts among as many contractors as practicable in order to develop the broad industrial base necessary for rapid mobilization. Where necessary, financial assistance is provided through advance payments and through Federal guaranties of private loans to defense contractors and subcontractors. In addition, the Department of Defense is constructing additional plants and facilities to produce military items not ordinarily produced by private firms for the civilian market.

Rapid expansion in output of defense equipment and supplies also depends on an adequate supply of raw materials and components. To encourage private businessmen to expand capacity in these areas, the tax laws now permit the portion of new investment attributable to defense requirements to be written off in 5 years for income tax purposes. Where the need is greater than private lenders can finance or the risk more than they can properly take, the Government is making direct loans or participating with private lenders. In other cases, the Government is entering into long-term procurement contracts, or is purchasing and installing Government-owned equipment in defense plants. Even with these liberal incentives, however, private enterprise cannot be expected to construct certain urgently needed, specialized productive facilities. For this reason, new legislation should include additional authority to construct Government-owned plants and facilities.

Production and distribution controls.—In order to build our defenses rapidly and efficiently, we must resort to direct governmental allocation to assure the proper use of our industrial facilities and materials. This means reimposing many of the production and distribution controls which were so successfully employed in the recent war years. Already steps have been taken to prevent excessive inventories, to cut back the amounts of critical materials going into nondefense uses, and to limit the production of certain nondefense goods using critical materials.

These controls must be augmented to keep pace with our rising production program. When the full impact of defense procurement is felt this spring and in the fiscal year 1952, even more comprehensive controls over the use of materials will become essential.

Price and wage controls.—While expansion in productive capacity will eventually mean a larger total output, its immediate effect is to add to inflationary pressures by absorbing manpower and materials which otherwise could be used to produce consumer goods. Vigorous use of credit controls and increased taxes, together with voluntary restraint by business and labor, have made it possible until recently to avoid direct controls over prices or wages.

At the present time, we are beginning to impose price and wage controls. Extension of such controls now appears inescapable. To administer such controls, as well as to promote effective voluntary cooperation, price and wage specialists are being recruited and offices are being opened in various cities as rapidly as they can be manned.

Rent control.—The developments in our defense program clearly require a further extension of rent control. Excessive rent increases will inevitably occur in many decontrolled communities where military installations are reopened or defense production expanded. The Congress has already recognized the changed situation by providing a temporary extension of controls beyond December 31, 1950, for all cases where communities have not taken affirmative decontrol action. I am recommending a further extension of rent control authority with provision for recontrol where necessary to protect tenants in defense areas against exorbitant rent increases.

Export controls.—Continuation of export controls is necessary to prevent undue drain from our economy of materials necessary for defense and essential civilian consumption and to make sure that the supplies made available for export make the maximum contribution to our international security objectives. These controls also help to prevent inflationary price increases. I recommend that export control authority be extended beyond the present expiration date of June 30, 1951.

Business loans and guarantees.—As part of the realinement of credit programs last summer, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation sharply curtailed nondefense loans involving substantial amounts of materials and other resources important for defense requirements. Within these limits, loans to small business production have been emphasized.

Under this policy, new loan authorizations this year have been reduced to less than half the level for the same period last year. Net expenditures for the fiscal year 1952 are estimated to decline by 76 million dollars from the fiscal year 1950. Estimated net expenditures for the fiscal year 1951 are even lower, but this reflects repayment last September of the 92-million-dollar Kaiser Steel Company loan.

The Corporation will continue to make loans for defense purposes, wherever borrowers are unable to obtain adequate credit elsewhere on reasonable terms but can meet the usual credit standards under the Corporation's statutory authority. Only if borrowers cannot qualify for loans under these standards are they eligible for loans from Defense Production Act funds.

A sustained defense program calls for a highly productive and mobile working force—well-trained, with skills fully utilized, and with good working conditions and labor relations. Mobilizing our strength requires changes in the numbers, location, and use of workers. We must make the most effective use of the technical ability, energy, and resourcefulness which have always characterized America at work.

Already, as defense production begins to rise, shortages of skilled workers such as machinists, tool and die makers, and draftsmen are occurring. Although there are still more than 2 million unemployed, in most of the 150 major labor market areas the number of idle workers has been decreasing, and in more than a third of the areas unemployment has practically disappeared.

In the next few months, nearly a million more men and women will be called into the Armed Forces. At the same time, more workers will be needed for defense industries. This means that hundreds of thousands of new workers—primarily women, but also older men and physically handicapped persons—must join the working force and that many people already employed must move to more essential activities.

To assure full utilization of manpower, we must quickly train new workers. We must increase our efforts to avoid losses of production caused by accidents, disputes, or poor working conditions. Production will be scheduled, materials allocated, and new plants located with careful consideration of labor supply. Where migration cannot be avoided, the Federal Government will assist localities to the extent necessary in getting adequate housing and other community facilities and services.

Although the Federal Government can assist in many ways, solving our manpower problems calls primarily for initiative and cooperation by management and labor. Agreements on seniority and welfare provisions will be needed to facilitate transfers of workers to essential activities. Training, upgrading, and other improvements in manpower utilization must be accomplished in the plant and the community. Labor-management committees are being set up in major labor market areas to promote all possible voluntary adjustments.

Because existing Federal labor programs are being redirected, most expenditures for defense activities in the manpower field will be made under regular appropriations. For additional defense activities which may become necessary, Defense Production Act funds will be used. Total expenditures under regular appropriations for the fiscal year 1952 are estimated at 215 million dollars. Three-fourths of this total is for grants-in-aid to pay all costs of administering the Federal-State system of public employment offices and unemployment insurance.

Placement and unemployment insurance activities.—The State employment services will have greatly increased responsibilities for recruitment, transfer, and placement of workers for defense industry and for our basic civilian economy. To minimize labor pirating and unnecessary migration, I urge that employers hire through their local employment services to the greatest extent possible. The employment services will try to place local workers, including women, older workers minority groups, and the physically handicapped, before recruiting from other areas. I also urge industry to use each individual's skill to the utmost and to adopt hiring specifications which do not exaggerate the strength and skills required.

In contrast to the expansion in employment service activities, the work of handling unemployment insurance claims will decrease because of high employment stimulated by defense production.

Labor standards and training.—In recent years, Federal programs of on-the-job training have emphasized the promotion of better apprenticeship standards. At the end of the fiscal year 1950, registered training programs employed 215,000 apprentices. A drive to increase the number of apprentices in key defense industries such as machine tools, metal working, and aircraft manufacture is now being launched. Further, a program to encourage on-the-job training of production workers and supervisors is being started with funds allocated to the Department of Labor.

World War II experience indicates that unless we intensify our preventive efforts, accidents will increase during a period of defense build-up, because of new kinds of production and new workers. To prevent loss of workers and loss of production, Defense Production Act funds will be used to help States plan special industrial safety campaigns and to train industrial supervisors and State safety inspectors.

To produce enough for defense, we must use wisely all our available labor resources. Even less than in other times can we now afford to discriminate in employment against the millions of workers in our labor force who are members of minority groups. Following the Federal experience with a Committee on Fair Employment Practice in World War II, eight States and a number of cities have established successful regulatory commissions to deal with employment practices. I again recommend that the Congress enact legislation to establish a Federal Fair Employment Practice Commission to prevent discrimination in interstate industries.

Labor relations.—Prompt handling of disputes in the sensitive field of labor relations is imperative if we are to avoid interruptions in defense production. A 25-percent increase is being recommended in the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service's mediation staff to enable it to act in any dispute affecting defense production.

Trust accounts and unemployment insurance legislation.—The receipts from payroll taxes on employers and the benefit payments for unemployment insurance go into and come out of the State and railroad accounts of the unemployment trust fund and are not included in Budget totals. For the fiscal years 1949 and 1950, unemployment insurance benefit payments exceeded the tax collections because of the temporary rise in unemployment. This year and next, the reserves in the trust fund will build up as unemployment continues to drop.

In this high employment period, we should take steps to bring the self-supporting unemployment insurance system up to date. After the Congress enacts improved Federal standards, time will be required for the States to bring their laws into conformity. Recommendations are now before the Congress to raise benefits, which now average less than a third of previously earned weekly wages, and to extend coverage, which has not kept up with that of other social insurance programs. The revision of unemployment insurance should also repeal last year's amendment which places a premium on court litigation as a means of determining claims for benefits.

TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATION

Our transportation and communication systems, already handling a high level of traffic, must be prepared for the even greater loads that would result from the full impact of mobilization.

New freight cars, ore boats, and other equipment recently ordered by the carriers will increase their capacity for meeting these larger needs. Equally important, however, will be the steps that must be taken to obtain the maximum utilization of existing capacity. Such action depends principally upon the cooperative efforts of carriers and shippers, but the Federal Government will provide leadership for these efforts and, where necessary, will impose controls to assure that all appropriate conservation measures are put into effect.

The Government must also continue to carry out its responsibilities for regulating the economic and safety aspects of transport and communication, for providing basic facilities and services, and for furnishing necessary financial aid. Federal programs have contributed to the growth of well-developed transport and communication systems; they must now assist these systems to adjust to the new demands placed upon them.

To carry out its many responsibilities in these fields, the Government will spend an estimated 1.7 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1952, or 285 million dollars less than in the fiscal year 1951. This expenditure decline depends, however, upon legislation which I am recommending to increase postal rates and thereby reduce the postal deficit.

Merchant marine.—Recent experience demonstrates again the large shipping demands imposed by an overseas military operation. To transport and supply our troops in Korea, more than 150 vessels of the Maritime Administration reserve fleet have been placed in operation to augment the merchant ships already operating in the Pacific and those which could be transferred from other areas. Our ability to meet rapidly this emergency need can be credited largely to the Government's long-range programs for supporting an active merchant marine and for preserving the surplus vessels of World War II.

Substantial assistance to our active merchant fleet is now provided through direct subsidies, tax benefits, long-term construction loans at low interest rates, and various other aids. Most important among these measures are the construction and operating subsidies, designed to offset lower foreign costs on essential trade routes. In fundamental scope and concept, this subsidy program continues to provide the most workable means for assuring an adequate base of vessels and shipyards, labor and management, for possible future expansion.

We are, however, supplementing this program with certain emergency measures, directed toward specific mobilization needs. Funds appropriated a few days ago will permit an immediate start on the construction of new and faster cargo ships better able to avoid attack by modern submarines. The desirable level of construction in future years is now under study. As a further measure, the Secretary of Commerce is establishing a National Shipping Authority within the Maritime Administration to handle existing functions related to shipping operations and to serve as the nucleus for future expansion of operations if circumstances require. Among other functions, this Authority will be prepared to provide marine war-risk insurance for private operators, should the need arise.

Navigation aids and facilities.—The defense program has attached a new and special urgency to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. Besides the large amounts of additional electric power which the project would make available, it would also provide economical and safe access, through the seaway, to the large deposits of iron ore in Labrador and Quebec. As expanding requirements for steel bring us closer to the depletion of our high-grade domestic ore reserves, the importance of these nearby deposits will correspondingly increase. Construction of the St. Lawrence project should be started at the earliest possible date, and I urge the Congress to authorize this program without delay.

The river and harbor program of the Corps of Engineers includes three other new power development projects, with estimated expenditures of 28 million dollars in the fiscal year 1952. These projects are discussed below under natural resources. Except for these and other projects involving power generation, construction and maintenance in this program have been substantially curtailed.

In addition to its normal functions of promoting the safety of life at sea and enforcing the maritime laws, the Coast Guard has recently been assigned responsibility for protecting our ports against sabotage. In the fiscal year 1952, the port security program will account for 23 million dollars of the total Coast Guard expenditures of 200 million dollars.

Aviation.—Facilities and services provided by the Civil Aeronautics Administration are essential for the safe operation of both civil and military aircraft. The present program for modernizing the Federal airways system has been expressly designed to meet the common needs of both groups, and the new facilities now being installed will permit the efficient handling of increased military traffic in the present emergency.

Some adjustments in aviation programs are being made in order to meet special military needs. Air navigation services in the Pacific have been expanded because of the airlift to Korea. The air traffic control system, normally concerned only with safety in flight, is now taking on the new function of identifying and controlling civil aircraft movements as a part of our air defense.

In keeping with the general public works policy of this Budget, construction of new facilities in the fiscal year 1952 will be limited to those projects which are most closely related to national security, or to civilian needs of an urgent nature. The same standards will be applied to grants for State and local airport construction.

In addition to the nearly 200 million dollars that will be spent in 1952 for aviation facilities and services, the Government will spend a substantial amount in subsidies to the airlines through mail payments. Federal financial assistance has been a major factor in the industry's rapid growth, and should be continued to the extent necessary for the sound development of civil aviation. The method of paying this subsidy should be changed, however, in order to provide the public with full information as to its cost. At present, the airline subsidy is merged with compensation for the cost of handling mail and included in postal expenditures. These two elements should be separated, and the subsidy portion paid by the Civil Aeronautics Board from funds appropriated specifically for that purpose. I again urge the Congress to enact legislation providing for this separation.

Highways.—Partly as a result of reduced construction and maintenance during World War II, our highway system is not yet fully prepared to handle the current peak levels of motor traffic. While long-range improvement is needed in all classes of roads, we must concentrate in the present emergency upon overcoming those road deficiencies which are most serious from the standpoint of national defense or essential civilian traffic.

The impact of defense traffic will be especially heavy upon the National System of Interstate Highways, a limited network of roads selected because of their special importance to both peacetime and defense needs. Substantial relocation and reconstruction are required in order to provide the width, strength, and other characteristics needed to handle anticipated traffic. In reviewing State and local requests for Federal aid, the Bureau of Public Roads will give primary emphasis to projects on this system, and to the principal urban roads which connect with it.

Construction will be started in the fiscal year 1951 on a small number of access roads immediately required to serve defense installations. As additional factories and military camps are activated for the defense program, the need for new or improved access roads will correspondingly increase. So far as possible, these and other emergency needs should be met by diversion of funds from roads of less urgency.

Postal service.—On the basis of existing postal rates, the postal deficit for the fiscal year 1952 is estimated at 521 million dollars. This actually represents a higher level than that shown for 1951, since the 1951 estimate of 632 million dollars includes a nonrecurring expenditure of 152 million dollars, for retroactive adjustment of railway mail rates. No allowance is made in these estimates for possible future increases in mail transportation rates which may result from regulatory proceedings now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board.

The Postmaster General is taking many steps to reduce the cost of postal operations. Significant economies have already been realized through recent reductions in service. Experimen'ts in the mechanized sorting of mail are being conducted. A streamlined money-order system will be established by July 1951. These and other similar measures will permit reductions in postal expenditures, some of which will be realized in the fiscal year 1952. At best, however, the total potential savings from improved efficiency are relatively small in relation to the present size of the postal deficit.

Since the end of the war, the productivity of postal employees per man-hour worked has increased by over 10 percent, and the steps now being taken will permit further gains in the future. Despite this improved productivity, however, the average cost per postal transaction has increased by nearly 60 percent during the same period, mainly as a result of employee pay raises and transportation rate increases. In the absence of adequate postal rate increases, the average revenue per transaction has increased by less than 10 percent. The resulting deficit of over one-half billion dollars would be unsound at any time, but it is especially untimely in a period when the Federal Budget must sustain extremely heavy defense expenditures. I therefore repeat, most emphatically, my many previous recommendations for rate legislation which will bring postal revenues into line with present costs, reducing the deficit to the costs of handling Government mail and other costs which are not properly chargeable to the general users of the postal service.

NATURAL RESOURCES

The economic and military strength of this country is dependent upon the availability and wise use of our basic natural resources. These resources, while extensive, are not unlimited. Our land, forest, water, mineral, power, atomic, and other resources made a vital contribution toward winning World War II and are now called upon to support the present military expansion. The Federal Government has a large responsibility for assuring the use of these resources to maximum advantage.

Our natural resources programs are being modified in order to make the greatest immediate contribution to our national security. In some cases, it is necessary to postpone desirable long-range developments in order to accomplish urgent immediate objectives. Maintenance and rehabilitation on all programs are limited to those expenditures necessary to prevent deterioration of the vitally important resources which are basic to our continued economic expansion. The resource programs of the various agencies emphasize the development of Alaska for economic security and national defense.

Expenditures for natural resources are estimated at 2.5 billion dollars for fiscal year 1952, half of which will be spent on the atomic energy program. Other large expenditures are those for flood control and reclamation, including hydroelectric power generation, and for the Tennessee Valley Authority program.

Estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1952 exceed those for 1951 by over 400 million dollars. This net expansion reflects increases of 459 million dollars for atomic energy and 65 million dollars for the Tennessee Valley Authority, a combined decrease of 141 million dollars for the flood control and reclamation programs, and small changes for other programs.

Atomic energy.—At the same time that we are actively pursuing industrial and other peacetime applications of atomic energy, present world developments demand intensification of the national security aspects of the program. The very substantial increases appropriated for the atomic energy program in fiscal year 1951 will provide for enlargement of production capacity for atomic materials and weapons. A portion of the funds recommended for 1952 provides for certain construction projects under this expansion program.

The Budget recommends increases also for the procurement and processing of raw materials, the production in existing plants of fissionable materials and weapons, and the investigation and development of new and improved weapons. The 1952 funds also allow for continuing development of new designs of nuclear reactors, including those for the production of fissionable material, the generation of power, and the propulsion of ships and aircraft. The Atomic Energy Commission will continue its vigorous program in basic and applied research in the physical sciences and in biology and medicine.

Land and water resources.—A year ago I appointed a Water Resources Policy Commission to recommend policies to guide Federal participation in the development, conservation, and use of water resources. This Commission has now submitted the first volume of its report and will submit two additional volumes. The Commission's report will be reviewed to determine what administrative actions and legislative recommendations may be needed to improve the Government's water and related land-use programs.

Although long-range improvement of our river basins is essential for the continued economic strength of the country, in the fiscal year 1952 we must emphasize those aspects of the programs which primarily support the national defense. Immediately after the first attack in Korea, all Government agencies were directed to review their programs and to adjust them to meet urgent needs. Many of the river basin projects contribute to defense as well as civilian industrial requirements through providing low-cost electric power in shortage areas. These projects are being pushed forward. Other projects, though desirable from a long-range standpoint, are being curtailed or deferred. As a result of these actions, combined expenditures required in the fiscal year 1952 for continuation of projects of the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Engineers now under way—involving dams, power facilities, canals, channels, and levees—are estimated to decrease by nearly 150 million dollars from the 1951 level.

Following a careful review of power requirements for the defense program, seven new projects, all of which will provide substantial power benefits, are included in this budget. These new projects, together with the installation of additional power units in projects already under way and the related facilities required to transmit the power, are estimated to cost in total 1.5 billion dollars and to provide 3.9 million kilowatts of installed capacity. The projects are Hells Canyon, The Dalles and Ice Harbor in the Columbia Basin, Old Hickory on the Cumberland River, a steam plant in the Tennessee Valley, Gavins Point on the Missouri River, and the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. These seven are the only new projects recommended for the river-basin programs. Four of them are in the river and harbor program, and funds for them are included in the transportation category.

The new projects together with projects completed or under way by the Bureau of Reclamation, Corps of Engineers, and Tennessee Valley Authority will provide ultimate capacity of 20 million kilowatts. Funds recommended in 1952 for the Bonneville, Southwestern, and Southeastern Power Administrations, Bureau of Reclamation, and Tennessee Valley Authority will provide properly scheduled facilities to transmit power to principal load centers.

I am also including funds in this Budget to plan for the urgently needed redevelopment of Niagara power facilities made possible by the recent treaty with Canada.

Following the Flood Control Act of 1950, I directed the Federal agencies concerned to work together on preparation of a comprehensive plan for development of the resources of the Arkansas, White, and Red River Basins and the New England-New York area. The Budget for 1952 provides funds to continue the surveys.

Mineral and other resource programs.—During and since World War II, the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey have concentrated upon research on the adequacy of mineral resources, the discovery of new resources, and means for improved development, conservation, and use of existing reserves. All of these activities have a clear defense significance and budget increases are recommended to accelerate them.

Funds for the management, protection, and development of other resources are at somewhat lower levels than would be desirable for good conservation practice. Increases are recommended for supervision and sale of timber resources and construction of access roads to increase the cut of timber, and for range improvement and fish and wildlife development to add to the supply of food and other essential products. Because of their importance to planning for defense projects, increases are also recommended for topographic mapping and water resources investigations. Programs for the management and development of national park areas and resources of Indian lands, and for other services to Indians have been held to the 1951 level or below.

To insure effective use of their lands, the Indians are in need of credit facilities. I recommend legislation which would augment the loan fund authorized in 1934 in an amount sufficient to meet the demands for credit over the next 5 to 10 years. Such legislation is preferable to a piecemeal approach of providing credit for selected tribes through individual bills.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES

During the period of concentration upon defense expansion, our Federal agricultural programs must serve one central purpose—the maintenance of our capacity to produce abundant quantities of food and fiber to meet our own needs and critical needs of friendly countries. Government farm programs now in effect make up, in general, the kinds of activities needed for the defense period. Some of these programs are being redirected to provide a greater contribution to the defense effort, as for example the production of fibers required for clothing and equipment for the Armed Forces.

American agriculture today is in a strong financial condition. The high postwar demand for agricultural products has maintained farm production and income at high levels. Gross farm income in the calendar year 1950, although below the peak level of 1948, was approximately three times as high as in 1940, and will show a further increase in 1951.

[2] Excludes $77 million of this permanent appropriation recommended to be made available for reimbursement to the Commodity Credit Corporation for the 1950 costs of the International Wheat Agreement.

With this outlook for agricultural prices and farm income, total Federal expenditures for agriculture and agricultural resources are expected to decline from 2.8 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1950 to 1 billion dollars in 1951 and to 1.4 billion dollars in 1952. Most of the change in agricultural expenditures from 1950 to 1952 is due to decreased expenditures for agricultural price supports.

Stabilization of farm prices and farm income.—Expenditures of the Commodity Credit Corporation for price-support purposes have declined greatly since mid-1950 because of the rise in farm prices and the short cotton crop. During the fiscal year 1951, it is now estimated that the Corporation will realize net receipts of 296 million dollars compared with net outlays in 1950 of 1.6 billion dollars. Receipts from sales of nearly 3.5 million bales of cotton acquired from the 1948 crop will alone more than offset other expenditures for price support.

Present estimates of production, consumption, and exports of 1951 crops indicate that net expenditures for price support will be 238 million dollars in the fiscal year 1952. While commodity inventories are currently proving to be valuable in meeting increasing needs for foods and fibers, losses have occurred in the disposal of a number of perishable commodities, and further losses are expected to occur in 1952. To avoid the unnecessary accumulation and loss on perishable agricultural commodities, legislation is needed to permit direct payments to producers in lieu of market price supports through Government purchases. This would allow excess perishable commodities to move into consumption and would make our price support provisions more compatible with our international trade policy. To help the Commodity Credit Corporation dispose of its existing surpluses, it should be authorized to pay transportation and repackaging costs on surplus commodities distributed to public and private welfare organizations.

In addition to Commodity Credit Corporation price support expenditures, a permanent appropriation, equal to 30 percent of customs duties, is available for removal from the market of surplus agricultural commodities, mainly perishables. With increasing demands for farm commodities, the total amount of this fund will not be necessary for this purpose in the fiscal year 1952. Accordingly, I recommend that 77 million dollars of the permanent appropriation be used to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for costs of the International Wheat Agreement in the fiscal year 1950.

Under the International Wheat Agreement, the United States guarantees the export of a certain quantity of wheat at the maximum price of $1.80 per bushel during the 4 years of the Agreement. The loss arising from the difference between this agreed-upon price and the higher domestic price of wheat is met from Corporation funds, with reimbursement later from appropriated funds. Because of an increase in export quotas and higher domestic wheat prices, expenditures for the Wheat Agreement are estimated to rise to 117 million dollars in the fiscal year 1951 and 115 million in 1952.

Expenditures under the Sugar Act of 1948 will increase in the fiscal year 1952 because of the larger volume of domestic sugar production in 1950 and 1951, and the provision in the law for mandatory payments to sugar producers.

Financing farm ownership and operation.—The loan programs supervised by the Farm Credit Administration will, in the defense period, facilitate farm operations and encourage farm ownership. These loan programs are largely financed by borrowing in the open market, and only the supervisory expenses of the Farm Credit Administration and changes in net investment of Government capital in the supervised banks and other corporations are included in Budget totals.

The loan activities of the Farmers' Home Administration, which also assist farm operations, are financed by funds borrowed from the Treasury. These activities are expected to remain at approximately the same level in the fiscal year 1952, with a decrease in farm ownership loans offset in part by some expansion in production and subsistence loans to meet the needs of reclamation settlers and low-income farmers for essential operating credit not available from other credit sources. The disaster loan program is expected to decline in 1952 below the abnormal levels required in 1950 and 1951.

Financing rural electrification and rural telephones.—By June 30, 1950, approximately 86 percent of all farms were electrified, compared with 48 percent in 1945. Last year, a new program to extend and improve rural telephone systems was begun. Although under normal conditions it would be desirable to continue the rapid progress on rural electrification and the provision of adequate rural telephones, shortages of metals, particularly aluminum and copper, and of electronic equipment, make it necessary to proceed more slowly with both the electrification and telephone programs. I recommend that the Rural Electrification Administration new loan authorization be reduced from the 297 million dollars available in 1951 to 109 million dollars in 1952. Expenditures will decline by a smaller amount because of the backlog of loans committed but not yet advanced. The reduction in new loan authorization will permit improvement and expansion of existing distribution capacity where essential, but will require some curtailment of loans for new facilities.

Conservation.—Efforts to promote conservation and development of agricultural land and water resources are aided by the Department of Agriculture through the technical advice and assistance of the Soil Conservation Service, the flood control program, and the conservation payments program. Although some phases of these programs may in future years need to be expanded to maintain and improve our soil resources, the higher priority which must now be given to defense programs requires in the 1952 Budget a policy of no expansion of present conservation programs. I, therefore, recommend that funds for flood control and the Soil Conservation Service be held at the present level and that the advance authorization for the conservation and use program in the 1952 crop year, which will largely determine expenditures in the fiscal year 1953, be continued at the 1951 crop-year level of 285 million dollars.

Research and other agricultural services.—An appropriation of 171 million dollars is recommended for the continuing basic services for agriculture, including research on crop varieties, livestock and poultry, and the production and marketing of farm products; control and eradication of insects and plant and animal diseases; meat inspection; payments to States for experiment stations and cooperative extension work; and general overhead expenses of the Department of Agriculture. This amount also includes 33 million dollars to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for 1950 expenses of the program to eradicate foot-and-mouth disease in Mexico. Although there are many worth-while research and service programs which it would be desirable to expand under more normal conditions, I recommend at this time that they be held at or below their 1951 level. Finally, I recommend legislation to enable the Commodity Exchange Authority to control speculative trading and to strengthen its regulation of commodity exchanges.

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

In the years since World War II, we have made a good start toward achieving adequate housing and community facilities for our people. In the last 12 months over 1,350,000 new housing units were produced, a third above the previous record level. About half of this new housing was financed with mortgages insured or guaranteed by Federal agencies. Under the comprehensive legislation enacted by the Eighty-first Congress, the Federal Government has begun to aid in clearing slums and redeveloping our cities; to assist local housing authorities in providing adequate housing for low-income groups; to promote better farm housing; and to conduct or sponsor the basic research needed to realize the full potentialities of the construction industry.

Continuance of the high level of housing construction achieved in 1950, while entirely desirable in normal times, would use materials and manpower now needed to meet defense requirements. Accordingly, to help the defense program go ahead full speed and to reduce inflationary pressures on construction costs, it has been necessary to take measures to reduce residential construction this year by more than a third, to a level of about 850,000 units annually.

To meet defense needs, four major revisions have been made in our housing and community development programs. First, comprehensive limitations have been imposed on all types of credit to finance new housing construction, as well as on all Government-guaranteed credit to finance purchase of existing homes. Second, in both existing and proposed new programs, we are giving top priority to military and defense-related housing and community facilities. Third, subject only to defense priorities, we are giving special emphasis to housing for lower-income groups in accordance with the general objectives of national housing policy. Fourth, we are rapidly organizing under newly enacted legislation to meet the civil defense requirements of the Nation.

Most of the existing Federal programs are financed by authorizations already made by the Congress in basic statutes. Partly because of the sharp curtailments in programs, only a small part of those authorizations will be spent in the fiscal year 1952. Moreover, sales of mortgages purchased by the Government in earlier years and collections on loans will cause a substantial excess of receipts over new expenditures for several going programs. Therefore, despite increased expenditures for civil defense and for the proposed new defense-supporting legislation, the housing and community development category as a whole in the fiscal year 1952 will realize estimated net receipts of 102 million dollars.

Defense housing, community facilities and services.—As the defense effort accelerates, additional housing and community facilities and services in many key areas will undoubtedly be required to take care of the influx of defense workers and military personnel. We shall continue to place primary reliance on the initiative of private builders and local communities to provide the new construction and services required. To reinforce and supplement this initiative, I am recommending several basic changes in legislation to meet specific defense needs for housing, community facilities and services.

The expansion in the defense program makes more urgent the provision of an adequate supply of rental housing. Military installations and defense plants will find it difficult to meet their expanding manpower requirements if adequate housing is not available at reasonable rents. For this reason, despite the cutbacks in total construction, it is essential to increase new private rental housing in defense areas. The legislation which I am proposing will provide more liberal insurance for loans financing construction of a limited number of rental units in these areas. In addition, it will extend the temporary program for insurance of military housing loans beyond the present expiration date of June 30, 1951, and will include similar insurance for mortgages to finance rental housing near installations of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The adaptability of prefabricated housing to defense housing requirements makes it imperative that present producers of proven efficiency be able to obtain adequate financing for their operations—especially for the distribution of such housing. The proposed legislation will help meet the special financing problems of this industry.

In some areas where the most rapid expansion in military or defense-related activities will occur, local communities and private builders cannot be expected—even with these new aids—to meet all the emergency requirements for housing and community essentials. This problem will be particularly acute where large installations are located in small communities or isolated areas. To prevent delays in recruitment and to assure a reasonably stable labor supply in such areas, the Federal Government should have authority, as in World War II, to construct housing units and to make loans and grants for community facilities and services. This authority should be limited to meeting defense needs and even then should be available only when these needs could not otherwise be met. Accordingly the proposed legislation would authorize direct Federal construction of defense housing and provision of Federal funds for community facilities and services. For these purposes, as well as for the necessary extension and expansion of defense-related private housing aids, the Budget includes estimated appropriations of 150 million dollars.

Civil defense.—With modern methods of warfare our Nation could be subjected to a sudden, devastating enemy attack. The military services have responsibility for warding off attack, but effective civil defense can sharply reduce the injuries, loss of life, and destruction of homes and factories that otherwise might occur.

Under legislation just enacted, the Federal Civil Defense Administration will provide equal matching grants to States for the construction of shelters and other protective facilities in critical target areas. These grants account for the larger part of the expenditures projected for this program in the fiscal year 1952. The Administration will also begin building a national reserve of supplies and equipment. In addition, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will make loans to public authorities for public works which can serve both as shelters and for other community purposes, when the Administrator certifies that there is a civil defense necessity for such projects.

Aid to private housing.—The record levels of private housing construction in recent years have been stimulated in large part by widespread and generous Federal credit aids—mainly Federal insurance or guarantees of private mortgage loans and Federal purchases to support the market for these mortgages. By reducing the liberality of these aids, it has been possible to cut back housing construction in recent months wtihout imposing direct controls.

Federal National Mortgage Association.—Changes in law and administrative policy governing the Federal National Mortgage Association have sharply curtailed new purchases of mortgages (except those covered by earlier commitments) and have helped to stimulate an increasing volume of sales of mortgages previously purchased. As the large backlog of old commitments is gradually drawn down, the net expenditures of this program will continue to decline. In the fiscal year 1952 net receipts of 530 million dollars are expected, primarily from the accelerated sales program. By that time, we plan to return this secondary mortgage market largely to a stand-by status and to place a substantial part of the unused mortgage purchase authority in reserve for possible future emergency requirements.

Federal Housing Administration.—The higher down payments and other limitations placed on housing credit have caused a sharp decline in applications for mortgage insurance under existing Federal Housing Administration programs. Nevertheless, in 1952, roughly one-half the total new housing produced, as well as purchases of nearly 200,000 existing homes, will probably be financed with the aid of Federal mortgage insurance. From the standpoint of the Federal Budget, these programs will continue to show net receipts, since the estimated premium income will exceed administrative expenses and probable losses.

Home Owners' Loan Corporation.—The Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be liquidated before the close of the current fiscal year. All of the Federal investment of more than 3.7 billion dollars made during the depression years of the 1930's will be repaid in full and in addition the earned surplus of 14 million dollars will be paid to the Treasury. These payments will successfully complete one of the largest emergency financing operations of the depression years.

Direct veterans loans.—Under the Housing Act of 1950, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs was given temporary authority to make a maximum of 150 million dollars in direct housing loans to veterans in areas where, even with the support of the secondary market, adequate financing is not obtainable. Experience to date indicates only a limited need for such loans, which private lenders should be able to provide. Accordingly, I do not recommend the extension of this program beyond the current fiscal year.

Farm housing.—As part of the general limitation of new housing construction, new loans for farm housing in the fiscal year 1952 will be held to less than a third of the 75 million dollars authorized in the basic statute.

Public housing programs.—In the fiscal year 1952, construction of an estimated 75,000 new units will be started under the low-rent public housing program, well below the annual level of 135,000 units authorized by the Housing Act of 1949. These units will serve two major purposes. They will not only help meet the long-neglected housing needs of low-income families, but will also make an important contribution to defense housing requirements. To make sure that the full defense potentialities are realized, the Public Housing Administration, to the maximum extent feasible, will give preference to projects serving defense areas and will require local housing authorities to give military personnel and defense workers preference as tenants.

During the current year, the initial construction is being financed largely through temporary Federal loans. In 1952 and later years, however, both the initial construction and the permanent capital investment in the local projects will be largely financed by obligations issued by the local housing authorities to private investors on the security of the annual Federal contributions. In the fiscal year 1952, collections and private refinancing of earlier loans will cause substantial net receipts. Federal expenditures for annual contributions to help pay rentals of low-income tenants will increase moderately, but in the case of projects occupied by defense workers the income of the occupants will be sufficient to make Federal contributions unnecessary to help pay their rents.

Loans to educational institutions.—Soon after the aggression in Korea last summer, authorizations under this program were suspended to permit reappraisal of college housing needs. On the basis of this reappraisal, a maximum of 40 million dollars out of the 300 million dollars authorized by the Housing Act of 1950 has been provided, to be used only for college housing directly contributing to defense. No other loans will be made under this program until the outlook for college enrollment shows a clear need for such housing.

Slum clearance and urban redevelopment.—The long-range program for clearance of slums and redevelopment of the major urban areas, for both private and public use, is still in its early stages. Commitments for planning advances have been issued to 70 cities.

Because of the great importance of encouraging orderly development of our cities—and the small amounts of manpower and other resources involved in the early years—steady progress should continue in the planning stage of this program. Local authorities also may acquire sites, but will not demolish existing buildings or otherwise redevelop areas unless the redevelopment is consistent with defense requirements. Under this basic policy, net expenditures of $65,000,000 are anticipated for the fiscal year 1952—primarily for planning advances and temporary loans for acquisition of sites. This contrasts with the additional $350,000,000 in authority which becomes available in 1952 under the basic statute.

Advance planning loans.—Advances to State and local governments for public works planning have been suspended except when the projects involve defense-related or essential civilian requirements. While in a normal peacetime economy this program makes a major contribution to economic stability, it does not now appear advisable to extend it beyond the present expiration next October.

The challenge of communist imperialism requires the full potential of all our people—their initiative, their knowledge, their skills, and their ideals. These qualities have given this Nation world leadership in science and industry. Education and research are vital to the maintenance of this leadership.

The highly developed technology of the Nation requires an educated people equipped to operate this productive system efficiently. Likewise, it requires continuing basic research and the practical application of new knowledge and new techniques. Yet we start our defense effort with an educational system which fails to provide adequate educational opportunities for all our people, and with a lack of balance in the Nation's research activities.

The Federal Government took a major step last year toward achieving a better balance in research through the creation of the National Science Foundation, but urgently needed general legislation in the field of education was not enacted. This Budget includes provision for grants to the States for the operating expenses of elementary and secondary schools to assist in improving educational opportunities for our children. This proposal accounts for more than half of the total estimate of $483,000,000 of expenditures for education and general research in the fiscal year 1952, and for most of the estimated increase over 1951.

In addition to programs included in this total, many Federal agencies carry on specialized education and research activities which are included under other categories, such as veterans' services and benefits, military services, and agriculture.

Promotion of education.—Strong elementary and secondary education systems throughout the country are vital to national strength and to the improvement of individual opportunity Although educational opportunities are excellent in some parts of the country, children and youth in too many of our communities still do not receive adequate education. Inequalities exist primarily because of differences in the financial resources of the States and localities.

The Nation as a whole suffers from these inequalities. The results are demonstrated most sharply in times like the present. The military services even find it necessary to teach some inductees reading and writing before they can begin combat training. From the standpoint of national security alone, as well as the enlargement of opportunities for the individual, the Nation needs to see that every youth acquires the fundamental education and training which are essential to effective service, whether in the Armed Forces, in industry, or on the farm. I therefore urge the Congress to authorize Federal financial assistance to help the States provide a level of elementary and secondary education that will meet the minimum needs of the Nation. The Budget includes a tentative appropriation estimate of 300 million dollars for this purpose.

To help meet one particular educational problem, laws were enacted last year to make a single agency—the Federal Security Agency—responsible for giving financial assistance to schools or, if necessary, establishing schools for the education of children living on Federal property or in areas especially affected by Federal activities. Previously a variety of arrangements existed, and some of these children were denied free public education. The Budget includes expenditures of 106 million dollars in the fiscal year 1952 for buildings and current operating expenses under these new laws.

In view of the present necessity to provide training for defense production, a part of the appropriations for the general purpose of vocational education and training should be used for the training of workers for defense and essential civilian production. This Budget provides for the designation of 10 million dollars of the proposed vocational education appropriation for the fiscal year 1952 for this purpose.

Last year I recommended a program of aid to college students to help equalize educational opportunities. The proposal is omitted from this Budget pending reconsideration of the kind of program that will best fit into Selective Service policies and general manpower requirements.

Science Foundation.—The National Science Foundation, established by law last year, is now organized and planning its program. The limited funds available to it in the current fiscal year will not permit the Foundation to proceed beyond initial preparations. An appropriation request for the fiscal year 1952 will be submitted this spring to enable the Foundation to initiate the important work of formulating a national policy for basic research, stimulating such research, and training scientific personnel.

SOCIAL SECURITY, WELFARE, AND HEALTH

Last year the Congress enacted important improvements in our social security program. Coverage under old-age and survivors insurance was extended to some 10 million additional workers. Eligibility requirements were relaxed for older people, so that many more will qualify for retirement annuities in the near future. The level of benefits was raised substantially and the taxable wage base was increased moderately, to make the benefits and the taxes more commensurate with earnings.

In taking this step, the Congress clearly decided that social insurance, rather than public assistance, is to be the primary vehicle for providing social security in this country. This accords fully with our American tradition of self-reliance. In the future, the great majority of American families will obtain, through their own and their employers' contributions, a considerable degree of insurance protection against poverty arising from the old age or death of the wage earner.

In spite of these far-reaching improvements, however, the Nation's social insurance program still does not measure up to the full needs or aspirations of the American people; nor has it by any means achieved the scope of protection that our economy can afford and should give. Millions of people, including self-employed farmers, many domestic and agricultural workers, many public employees, and members of the Armed Forces, still are not under social insurance. Our aim should be to establish for all employed people a minimum protection that each person takes with him wherever he works. Pension and insurance plans for special groups should supplement social security benefits, as industry pensions already do for several million workers. Moreover, we need to fill important gaps in our social insurance system by providing protection on a prepaid basis against the costs of medical care and the loss of family income in cases of disability. These measures will help to provide that material security which is essential to a vigorous democracy and a highly productive labor force.

All Federal programs of social security, welfare, and health are estimated to require expenditures of 2.6 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1952, an increase of 105 million dollars over the current year. Three-fourths of the expenditures are for public assistance, for accident compensation payments, and for the transfer of railroad payroll tax receipts to the railroad retirement trust account. The amounts of these expenditures are all determined by statutory requirements. The remaining one-fourth provides for all the public health activities of the Government, for aid to various special groups, and for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other crime control and correction services.

Public assistance.—The same legislation which extended coverage of old-age and survivors insurance also made changes in the Federal-State public assistance program. It authorized Federal grants for assistance to totally and permanently disabled persons, extended the aid for dependent children to include a relative who takes care of such children, and provided for Federal sharing of payments made by the States to hospitals and doctors furnishing medical care for persons receiving public assistance.

With many more persons eligible now or in the near future for old-age and survivors insurance benefits, and with the increased employment opportunities of the defense economy, public assistance should conform more nearly to its intended purpose of filling gaps in social insurance. Thus, increases in expenditures resulting from the new public assistance legislation are expected to be largely offset by decreases resulting from a reduction in the number of children and old people on the public assistance rolls. The estimated expenditures of 1.3 billion dollars for public assistance in the fiscal year 1952 exceeds by 20 million dollars the amount for the current year.

Aid to special groups.—The present Federal-State program for rehabilitation of the disabled will return 65,000 persons to productive work this year. This program should be expanded. Bringing these people into the ranks of the gainfully employed, besides improving their economic self-reliance, adds to our national productive capacity.

Railroad Retirement Board.—Expenditures shown for the Railroad Retirement Board represent principally a bookkeeping transfer of payroll taxes, collected from railroad workers and companies, to the railroad retirement trust account, where they are added to the reserve against future benefit payments. The estimate for the fiscal year 1952 also includes a 33-million-dollar payment by the United States to the trust account for the cost of military service credits for railroad workers. Increased railroad payrolls expected in 1952 are responsible for a rise of 48 million dollars in the estimate. I again recommend that these taxes be transferred to the fund as they are collected, rather than in advance of collection, in order to correct the present indefensible practice whereby the Federal Government pays interest on money that it advances to the fund.

Promotion of public health.—If we are to meet successfully the challenge that confronts this Nation, we can less than ever afford to waste the good health of our people. But the present emergency makes even more difficult the maintenance of good health.

Our chronic shortage of doctors, dentists, and nurses will be aggravated as more of them are called into the Armed Forces. Therefore, we need, more than ever, prompt enactment of legislation that will help to increase enrollment in medical and related schools, by assisting them to meet their costs of instruction and to construct additional facilities where needed. Scholarships should be provided to attract larger enrollments in nursing schools and grants should be made to States for vocational training of practical nurses. Estimated Budget expenditures in the fiscal year 1952 include 25 million dollars for this proposed program.

Many communities that will be faced with added health burdens arising from defense needs do not have adequately staffed local health departments—indeed, some communities have none at all. To help overcome this deficiency, I urge the Congress to enact legislation which will make possible more adequate Federal grants to the States for the strengthening of their local health services. The Budget includes 5 million dollars as the estimated first-year cost of this proposed legislation.

More than one-half of all Federal expenditures for the promotion of public health—estimated at 350 million dollars for the existing programs in the fiscal year 1952—consists of grants to State and local governments. These grants are available for a variety of public health programs, including general health services, hospital construction, maternal and child health, and control of certain specific diseases such as venereal disease, tuberculosis, cancer, mental illness, and heart disease.

Federal expenditures for hospital construction grants are estimated at 136 million dollars, about 4 million dollars less than in the current year. Federal expenditures for other existing programs of grants to States are estimated at 72 million dollars, a slight increase over 1951, due entirely to the expanded grants for maternal and child welfare services provided by the recent amendments to the Social Security Act. The principal direct Federal programs are the research and hospital activities of the Public Health Service.

Trust funds.—The three major retirement systems administered by the Government are the old-age and survivors insurance, railroad retirement, and Federal employee retirement and disability programs. Benefit disbursements are made directly from trust accounts and are not included in Budget expenditures. Receipts of the trust funds are mainly employer and employee payroll contributions. In the case of the railroad retirement system, these receipts are included in total Budget receipts and are transferred to the trust account as a Budget expenditure. The Government contributes as an employer to the Federal employee retirement funds and, for those Federal workers who are not covered by these special programs, to the old-age and survivors insurance system. These contributions appear as Budget expenditures. Payroll contributions received from other employers and from workers for old-age and survivors insurance are transferred directly to the trust fund and are not included in total Budget receipts. Accumulated assets in the three major trust funds now total 20 billion dollars; the money is invested in Government securities and the interest earned is added to the principal of each trust fund.

Receipts and expenditures under the proposed medical care insurance program would be handled through a trust account, paralleling the procedures for old-age and survivors insurance. A period of preparation will be required to set up the health insurance system. I am proposing that in the meantime a small payroll tax of one-fourth of 1 percent each on employees and employers be levied to provide for initial expenses.

VETERANS' SERVICES AND BENEFITS

In the fiscal year 1952 expenditures for veterans' services and benefits will be under 5 billion dollars for the first time in 6 years. This results from a further decline in requirements for the readjustment of veterans of World War II.

During the coming years, because we shall need to maintain larger Armed Forces, virtually all our able-bodied young men may be required to serve their country in its military forces. Before many years, nearly all the population may be veterans or the dependents of veterans.

This means a profound change in the social and economic import of Government programs which affect veterans. It requires a clear recognition that many of the needs of our veterans and their dependents can be met best through the general programs serving the whole population. Therefore, in legislation directed particularly to the problems of servicemen and their dependents, we should provide only for those special and unique needs which arise directly from military service. We should meet their other needs through general programs of the Government.

Readjustment benefits.—A decline of nearly 800 million dollars in expenditures for veterans' readjustment, to 1.6 billion dollars estimated for the fiscal year 1952, will result almost entirely from reduced enrollments for education and training.

Under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, eligible veterans are required to initiate their courses of training by July 25, 1951. Accordingly, with the program drawing to a close, the enrollment in institutional, on-the-job, and farm-training courses in the fiscal year 1952 is expected to average about 1 million, a decline of some 600,000 from 1951. By the end of the fiscal year 1952 more than 7,500,000 veterans will have received education and training under this program at a cost of 13.9 billion dollars.

Other expenditures for readjustment benefits cover guarantees of veterans' loans, unemployment allowances, tuition and supplies for the training of disabled veterans, and Government grants to certain seriously disabled veterans. Government expenditures for the loan guarantees in the fiscal year 1952 are estimated at 110 million dollars, largely for a gratuity of 1 year's interest on the guaranteed portion of each loan. By the end of the fiscal year 1952 over 3 million veterans will have borrowed 18 billion dollars in Government-guaranteed loans for homes, farms, and businesses.

The Eighty-first Congress enacted legislation to meet the special rehabilitation needs of disabled veterans injured in Korea. By renewing the program of vocational rehabilitation which was in effect during and after World War II for disabled veterans, and by providing medical treatment, hospital services, and monthly compensation, the Government is assisting our disabled veterans to return to a self-reliant and productive role as civilians.

Broader problems of policy arise when we consider the readjustment needs of nondisabled veterans. In preparing to meet their needs, we naturally think first of the combat veterans of the Korean fighting, but we must remember that during the coming years the lives of nearly all our young men also may be interrupted for service to their country. When the time comes that these future veterans can be discharged, we must be sure that they will be able to readjust rapidly to normal civilian pursuits.

The provision of education benefits, vocational training, loan guarantees, and unemployment allowances to World War II veterans represented a new and more positive approach to the veterans' readjustment problem than the pensions and bonuses previously provided. There is ample evidence that the "GI bill" has benefited the Nation as well as millions of veterans, despite abuses which impaired the readjustment of some veterans and added to the cost of the whole program.

Any future program should not only avoid past mistakes but should also be fitted to our changed economic and military outlook. The readjustment needs of the men in the Armed Forces now and in the future are likely to be quite different from the needs of World War II veterans. The requirements of future veterans will depend on how long our young men serve, what they do while in military service, and their ages and family responsibilities at time of discharge. The need for special programs for veterans will depend also on how many of our young men serve, the job opportunities open to them afterward, and the types of services available to them under governmental programs for the population as a whole. When all these factors are considered, it is clear that an extension of the "GI bill," without material changes, would perpetuate provisions not suited to changed conditions. It could result in excessive expenditure of public funds and still fail to accomplish the objective of helping the veteran to readjust.

The full assessment of these complicated problems requires careful study in order that we may adopt the best policies for future Government programs affecting veterans. In that assessment, we need to take careful account of our own national experience over the last 6 years and the requirements imposed by our changed military and economic needs.

Compensation and pensions.—It is estimated that payments for compensation and pensions will total more than 2.2 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1952, and will be made to an average of 3,168,000 individuals and families. This is an increase over the current year of 113,000 in the average number of cases, and of 25 million dollars in expenditures. Of the compensation cases, which result from service-connected disabilities or deaths, 82 percent relate to military service during or after World War II. Of the pension recipients, 7 percent are veterans or the dependents of veterans of World War II.

The total of 2.2 billion dollars for 1952 includes 1.5 billion dollars in compensation payments, covering an average of 345,000 families of deceased veterans and 2,010,000 veterans with service-connected disabilities. Also included is 80 million dollars for subsistence allowances to service-disabled veterans in the vocational rehabilitation program, a decrease of 56 million dollars below the 1951 level. Pension payments will be made in an estimated 812,000 non-service-connected cases. The total of 605 million dollars for these pension payments is 75 million dollars higher than in the current year.

Insurance.—Government liabilities for life insurance programs for servicemen and veterans are mainly for the costs of administration and for payments on account of deaths traceable to the extra hazards of military service.

In view of the Korean hostilities and the current enlargement of the Armed Forces, there is pressing need for new legislation to assure financial protection to the families of servicemen. The present national service life insurance program does not meet this need. Because it is optional, the protection is not carried by some servicemen and is held in less than adequate amounts by others. The system is complex and costly and absorbs excessive manpower, especially when the Armed Forces are large and manpower scarce.

It would be more equitable, and over the last decade it would have been more economical, to provide a free and automatic $10,000 indemnity to the survivors of all who die while in military service, and to establish a special new system of voluntary insurance open only to veterans whose insurability at standard rates has been impaired by military service. I recommend that this Congress now enact such legislation and extend its benefits to the dependents of those servicemen who have died while on active duty since June 27, 1950, if they did not have a like amount of servicemen's insurance protection.

Hospitals and medical care.—Expenses for hospital and medical care are estimated at 650 million dollars in the fiscal year 1952, 49 million more than in the current year. The average number of patients in hospitals and homes is estimated at 138,000, an increase of 5,000 over the current year. Approximately two-thirds of present patients are being treated for non-service-connected disabilities.

The presently approved construction program of 766 million dollars, to provide 36,500 new hospital and domiciliary beds, will be four-fifths completed by the end of the fiscal year 1952. Obligational authority already available is more than adequate to complete the program.

Trust funds.—About 6.5 million life insurance policies are now outstanding under two trust funds operated for servicemen and veterans. One is for the Government life insurance program established for servicemen in World War I; the other is for national service life insurance, its World War II counterpart.

Expenditures from these trust funds are expected to exceed receipts by 265 million dollars, because dividends estimated at 546 million dollars will be paid to policyholders in the fiscal year 1952. During the fiscal years 1950 and 1951 dividends which had accumulated over an extended period were paid from these funds, so that the trust fund expenditures in those two years exceeded receipts by 2 billion dollars. At the end of the fiscal year 1952, the Government securities and cash held by the funds will still exceed 6.4 billion dollars.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT

Expenditures for general government in the fiscal year 1952 are estimated at 1.4 billion dollars, an increase of 99 million dollars over the current year. This total includes 164 million dollars for the dispersal of governmental facilities.

Dispersal of Government facilities.—The acceleration of the defense effort requires additional Government buildings to accommodate the increased number of Federal employees in the District of Columbia. From the viewpoint of security, the new buildings should not be located in the central area of the District of Columbia but should be located within commuting distance and sufficiently removed from each other to assure continuity of operations in the event of air attack. Long-range planning goals for the Capital area also call for dispersal of Government buildings. I therefore urge the Congress to provide the necessary authority and funds to begin promptly a program for the dispersal of Government offices now located in the District of Columbia.

As distinct from dispersal, functions will be decentralized to locations outside the vicinity of the District of Columbia only in those instances where the functions involved can be permanently located at further distances without significant loss of efficiency.

Federal financial management.—New tax legislation has created additional problems of tax collection. The increase in the estimate for the Bureau of Internal Revenue will permit continued strengthening of audit and enforcement activities to try to insure that every person pays his full and fair share of taxes.

Present customs law imposes unnecessary difficulties upon the Nation's importers and hampers the conduct of international trade. I therefore urge the Congress to enact legislation to simplify customs procedures along the lines of recommendations previously transmitted.

Central property and records management.—When the General Services Administration was established in 1949, the Federal Government inaugurated a Government-wide effort to improve real and personal property management, including procurement, warehousing, traffic, utilities, and records management. In the last few months, special emphasis has been given to measures to eliminate every nonessential requirement for supplies and equipment; to set inventory ceilings at minimum levels in each agency and make any excess stocks available to other agencies; to screen thoroughly all surplus property declarations before making sales to the public; and to reduce the volume of records so as to release scarce office space and equipment.

Payments on Federal real estate.—As an outcome of conferences with State and local government officials, a proposal will shortly be transmitted to the Congress for a general plan to reduce the effects of Federal real estate acquisitions on State and local government finances. Payments to State and local governments would not generally begin until the second year after enactment of this measure.

Civilian employees retirement.—The Budget includes 320 million dollars for the annual Government contribution to enable the civil-service retirement and disability fund to cover its currently accruing obligations. Federal employees covered by the system are required by law to contribute 6 percent of their salaries toward future benefits. The Government contribution, designed to cover the remaining cost of benefits, amounts to approximately 2.6 percent of the payrolls of covered employees plus interest on the Government's liability to the fund for deficiencies in previous contributions.

INTEREST

The interest payments made by the Federal Government arise primarily from the huge additions made to the Federal debt in World War II. All interest payments are financed by permanent indefinite appropriations and therefore do not require annual Congressional action.

INTEREST

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Item	Expenditures			Obligational authority (permanent indefinite)
	1950 actual	1951 estimated	1952 estimated
Interest on the public debt	[1] $5,720	$5,625	$5,800	$5,800
Interest on refunds	93	90	92	92
Interest on uninvested trust funds	4	7	5	5
Total	5,817	5,722	5,897	5,897

[1] Includes 225 million dollars in nonrecurring payments resulting from a shift in reporting methods.

Interest on the public debt.—Interest payments on the public debt are estimated at 5.8 billion dollars for the fiscal year 1952, continuing the gradual increase of recent years. This increase is the product of a great number of factors, relating not only to the amount of Federal securities outstanding, but also to the composition of the debt by type of security and the interest rate structure of the debt.

About one-third of the increase in interest for the fiscal year 1952 is accounted for by the continued expansion of special issues to Government trust funds at rates of interest higher than the average on the public debt as a whole.

Second, the current increase in public debt is also reflected in higher interest expenditures.

A third important factor is the accrual of interest on savings bonds. These accruals are continuing to increase as the large volume of World War II savings bonds gets closer to maturity. Interest on savings bonds alone accounts for a little more than one-fourth of the total interest on the public debt. Most of this interest is received by individuals and is a reflection of the widespread distribution of the public debt at the present time.

Interest on refunds.—On most refunds of receipts interest is paid because the Federal Government has had temporary use of the funds. Most of the refunds result from overpayment of taxes. The interest rate paid on tax refunds, like that collected on tax deficiencies, is considerably higher than the average rate paid on the public debt.

I have presented a Budget to meet our country's needs in a period of danger.

We are building the military and economic strength which alone has meaning to the men who control world communism. This is the only realistic road to a world peace based on justice and individual freedom.

For the third time in this century we as Americans must subordinate our peacetime goals to what is required for the survival of the Nation. Our national objectives in the coming months demand unity of purpose among us and a spirit of dedication on the part of everyone. Our young men will devote more years to military service. All of us will work longer and harder than we have worked before. We will pay much heavier taxes. We must defer, in many cases, new governmental programs to enrich our national life and contribute to our individual and family welfare. But in return we will get something precious—strength to meet and overcome the barbaric threat of communism in whatever manner it confronts us.

We in this Nation have always, in time of national emergency, risen with unity and vigor to the defense of our free institutions and way of life. We are responding now. We go forward with faith and confidence to meet and win the tests ahead.

CERTAIN CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY AND NAVAL INSTALLATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 42)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On January sixth, I approved H. R. 9893, Eighty-first Congress, an act "To authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes."

The installations which will be provided under this act are urgently needed by the military services. I approved H. R. 9893 for that reason. However, one provision of this legislation, section 407, will have unfortunate results, which may not have been foreseen by the Congress. I recommend that this section be repealed as soon as possible.

Section 407 reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force may not grant or transfer to another Government department or agency other than a military department or to any other party any land or buildings of a permanent nature, or any interests in such property, except equipment no longer serviceable and except easements, leases, or permits deemed to be in the public interest, which shall have been acquired, constructed, or installed pursuant to the provisions of this or any previous act except as authorized by an act of Congress enacted subsequent to the date of enactment of this act.

This section, if permitted to stand, may seriously impede our mobilization effort by causing unnecessary and unwarranted delay in the transfer for other governmental uses of property excess to the needs of the military departments. The Atomic Energy Commission, for example, is not a military department. In time of emergency, transfers of Army, Navy, or Air Force property to enable that Commission to carry out its responsibilities should not have to be handled by separate enactments of the Congress.

By the same token, the military departments should not be delayed, as this section would delay them, in effecting exchanges of property with private owners. To illustrate, section 407 would prevent the Air Force from extending a runway at an air base by exchanging a portion of the air base lands for private lands contiguous to it needed for the runway extension. I am sure no such restriction was intended by the Congress.

There are contained in the Federal Property and Services Act of 1949, provisions which were enacted for the specific purpose of making possible the most efficient utilization of excess military property, including fixtures. In my judgment, section 407 repeals these provisions by implication. Furthermore, this section would appear to circumvent the provisions of that same act which charge the Administrator of General Services with the duties and responsibilities to promote maximum utilization of excess property among Government agencies. I cannot believe that it was the intent of the Congress to bring about this effect, or that the Congress will wish section 407 to stand in the way of immediate administrative action for transfer of property vital to the conduct of programs assigned to defense agencies other than the military departments.

Finally, it seems to me unwise at a time when the Congress will be fully concerned with matters of greatest national importance, to go through the process of reviewing in detail, transaction by transaction, the sale or disposition to the general public of such few pieces of property as may be determined to be surplus to the needs of the Government as a whole. It seems to me inevitable that there would be delay in handling such matters with a resulting expensive administrative burden upon agencies of the Department of Defense for maintaining and protecting such property until congressional action has been completed.

For these reasons, therefore, I urge the Congress to repeal section 407 of this act at its earliest opportunity.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 15, 1951.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SUTTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEED] is recognized for 10 minutes.

EFFECTS OF IMPORTS ON AMERICAN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, during the Eighty-first Congress I had the honor of serving as chairman of a subcommittee of the House Committee on Education and Labor to study the effects of imports on American employment. The hearings this subcommittee conducted are being printed and soon will be available to the Congress.

While most of the difficulties that some 17 American industries were facing because of unfavorable import conditions imposed on our country through reciprocal trade agreements have been temporarily eased because of the new rearmament program, our hearings show conclusively that the same ills will return to plague these American industries as soon as the present emergency passes.

Since the Congress will be called upon this session to consider again the reciprocal trade program, I commend these hearings to the Members who desire more factual information on just what far-reaching authority is granted and how the careless use of this authority can and does frequently undermine whole industries in this country.

These hearings contain considerable information about how we have permitted reciprocal trade agreements to benefit nations behind the iron curtain and to harm American factories and workers. I hope the Congress will provide the safeguards in the new reciprocal trade legislation that we need to avoid these abuses in the future.

But we now find another entirely new field of danger in the field of export and imports on the American scene. It is to this new danger that I desire to address my remarks today. I consider this new threat so serious that it should command the close attention of every Member of this Congress.

Within the past 2 years, two agreements have been made by various member nations of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization, better known as UNESCO, which provides for the free flow of certain specified materials among the signatory nations.

The first of the two agreements relates to visual and auditory materials on which the existing duties would be eliminated under certain conditions. The materials that would be affected are films, filmstrips, and microfilms, sound recordings, glass slides, models, wall charts, maps, and posters.

Any one of the contracting States would be permitted, if it should so elect, to impose regulations upon the importer to the material to insure that it shall only be exhibited or used for non-profit-making purposes. There is, however, nothing mandatory about this provision. It is wholly permissive in character.

This agreement was opened for signature at Lake Success, N. Y., July 15, 1949, and has been signed by 18 countries and ratified by 4. It will go into effect upon ratification by 10 countries. It was signed by the United States and was submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on August 22, 1950, by the Department of State.

The second of these two UNESCO agreements provides for the free importation of educational, scientific, and cultural materials. Among these are printed books, newspapers and periodicals, catalogs, manuscript music, maps, and certain engineering and architectural plans; scientific instruments or apparatus, intended exclusively for educational purposes or pure scientific research, provided that no instruments or apparatus of equivalent value are manufactured in the importing country.

This second agreement was completed in Florence, Italy, at the fifth session of the general UNESCO conference in June 1950, and was opened for signature by the member countries at Lake Success on November 22, 1950. Nineteen countries have signed the agreement but none has ratified it. It will go into effect when 10 States have ratified the agreement.

Article XII of this agreement provides that the parties to it shall take all the necessary measures for its fully effective operation within 6 months after the date on which it goes into effect. This means, of course, that any conflicting laws on the statute books must be set aside and positive action taken to implement the agreement.

Here are two agreements ranging in age from 6 months to a year and a half, that are virtually unknown to the American public; and their existence is perhaps news to most Members of the House of Representatives; yet they embody provisions which would rob the House of its joint constitutional authority as one of the two Houses of Congress, to impose duties and to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Ratification of the two treaties by the Senate would remove the items and materials subject to the agreements from the dutiable list or otherwise provide for their free importation. This end could not be accomplished under the regular legislative procedure without initiation of legislation by the House. Article I, section 7, of the Constitution provides that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."

Not only does the Constitution—article VI—provide that treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, thus requiring that existing laws in conflict with provisions of a treaty be repealed; but article XII of the second UNESCO agreement, cited above, provides specifically that the parties shall take all the necessary measures for its fully effective operation within 6 months after the date on which it goes into effect.

This is to say, the United States must not only modify its law to conform to the agreement, it must set aside the constitutional process—and must do so within 6 months. This represents a method of amending the Constitution without submitting the proposed amendment to the 48 States in the Union. The Senate thus becomes the supreme arbiter of how the Constitution may be amended by particular proposals arising outside of the legislative channels.

No public hearings were held preceding the two UNESCO agreements. There was a minimum of publicity. The meetings in which the agreements were drafted and revised were held in Europe. No elected representative of the American people participated in the meetings. Although the subject of import tariffs is a highly technical subject, the agreements were not drawn by tariff experts. No interested parties were given an opportunity to express their views or to provide practical information.

How many persons know the names, much less the background and training, of the UNESCO personnel whom we are asked to vest with powers to set aside the laws of our Congress and the provisions of our Constitution? Who knows how many Americans are represented in UNESCO? Can anyone name them?

If UNESCO has the power to make agreements that will permit the free importation of printed material, scientific apparatus, and other educational scientific and cultural materials, what is to prevent FAO from making agreements that will permit the free importation of food and agricultural products? Or the World Health Organization from agreeing to the free importation of pharmaceuticals and medicinal products? Or some other present or future subsidiary of the United Nations from abolishing the tariff on other groups of products? And if agreements can be made to abolish the tariff, why cannot the same principles be extended to other fields of agreement which would repeal domestic laws in other fields or amend our Constitution in other respects?

The provisions of the two UNESCO agreements, one of which is before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the second of which no doubt will come before the committee, are so far reaching in their implications that they should be examined and studied in the greatest detail—not so much for the substantive contents of these particular agreements as for the impact they may produce, as precedents, upon the powers of Congress and upon our Constitution.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEED. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. I want to thank the gentleman very much for bringing this up. There seems to be a very real danger of our failing to recognize the implications of the California decision of last year. You will recall that the Federal court held that under our Constitution a treaty superseded the law of the land. Is it not true that we should be particularly careful in any of these agreements we enter into? I am happy that the gentleman has emphasized this point at this time.

Mr. STEED. May I say that the purposes designed here are very desirable, but there is a much better way to achieve them than through these trick treaties they bring in here.

Mrs. BOLTON. I think it is exceedingly good that the gentleman is emphasizing this so thoroughly.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEED. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has made a statement which I am convinced Members should examine with great care.

Mr. STEED. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEED. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I want to compliment the gentleman on making a very good Republican speech.

Mr. STEED. I do not think the Republicans have a right to say that for a man to stand up for what he thinks is good constitutional procedure is solely the province of the Republicans.

RADIO CHAIN MONOPOLIES STRANGULATE OUR ONLY DEFENSE MASS COMMUNICATION SYSTEM

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, it has been forcibly brought to my attention that radio broadcasting stations are steadily closing up throughout important communities of our country. Only recently WOPT, located in Oswego, N. Y., the terminus of the vital barge canal and Lake Ontario, was forced to cease operation and surrender its license to the FCC because of the inability of the radio station to sustain further losses in its operation. This radio station was the only radio station located in this vital waterway community.

Further investigation made by me at the Federal Communications Commission disclosed these startling facts to be true. In 1947, 365 AM broadcasting stations operated in the red; in 1948, 581 AM radio broadcasting stations operated in the red; and in 1949, the latest report available at the FCC, showed that the startling total of 686 radio broadcasting stations were operating in the red. These figures are only for AM stations, and do not include the newer FM or television stations. The radio public being served by these stations have invested millions of dollars in radio receivers and there is at least one receiver in almost every home in our land. In light of the serious war situation which now faces us, it is imperative that each and every one of our radio broadcasting stations maintain radio service to the public.

A careful study of the problem shows that more money is being spent each year by the advertisers over the radio broadcasting medium, but still each year more stations close their doors and more stations are operating in the red, which soon will force them to close their doors. Further investigation shows that at this time, subsidies are not necessary to prevent the collapse of radio broadcasting facilities in many communities of our country.

Investigation does show, however, that many radio stations are being restrained from doing business with the advertisers which support the industry, by certain unlawful and monopolistic practices of the four major radio network chains operating in this country. This restraint is in direct violation of the intent of Congress as outlined in the legislative history of the Communications Act of 1934.

It has been brought to my attention that certain radio stations owned and controlled by the four major radio network monopolies have been restraining the broadcast of many important and high-grade radio programs under the intentional misinterpretation of section 325 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934.

By such restraint, these network monopolies have prevented millions of people from hearing these high-quality programs and they have prevented millions of dollars of revenue from reaching the various network affiliated, independent, both AM and FM, radio broadcasting stations, by the act of deliberately restraining trade between these stations and the numerous national radio sponsors and advertisers of the country.

A careful legislative history study of the act conclusively discloses that it was the intent of this Congress, in formulating the act that rebroadcasting of radio programs should be permitted where permission for the rebroadcast was obtained by a radio station from the person who paid large sums of money to prepare and produce these radio programs, and it was also the intent of this congressional body that the networks in no way should exert monopolistic influences or restrain trade within the radio-broadcasting industry.

Some years past certain labor organizations attempted to restrain the broadcasting of radio programs and this Congress acted quickly and decisively in preventing such restraint by enacting legislation which amended the Communications Act by inserting section 506 in the act, which section was entitled "Coercive Practices Affecting Broadcasting." This section came under the penal provisions of the act and carried severe fines and imprisonment for those who willfully violated the section.

It is even more important that this Congress act quickly and decisively, at the time when the radio industry in a large measure faces strangulation by the network monopolies, particularly when in view of the serious war situation, that each and every radio broadcasting station be allowed to continue operating without monopolistic restraint and in a free market, in order that the economic structure of each station will be on a sound footing, thereby allowing these stations to continue serving their vital and important role in the present serious defense emergency.

It is after a serious and thorough investigation into this very important medium of mass public communication that I offer the following radio legislation to correct a very urgent situation.

You will note that I have introduced two bills, one, H. R. 10, a simple solution to the rebroadcast rule which will give immediate economic relief to the hundreds of radio broadcasting stations in the country.

The other bill, H. R. 73:

First. Prevents radio networks from falling into the hands of aliens;

Second. Calls for the licensing and regulation of the radio networks, directly by the FCC, in a similar manner to the licensing and regulation of the individual radio stations by the FCC for the past 23 years;

Third. Considerably reduces the regulation of individual radio stations by the FCC, by regulating the networks direct and relieving all network affiliated stations of the responsibility for the violation of the network rules of the FCC by the networks;

Fourth. Prevents radio network monopolies from controlling the radio broadcasting industry and the very economic heart of the individual radio stations of this country.

In light of the fact, that radio stations are closing their doors; that the FCC reports indicate that last year 686 radio broadcasting stations were operating at a loss; that the FCC has no legislation by which it can licerise and regulate the radio network monopolies; that the FCC cannot at present investigate and prevent the radio networks from being owned and controlled by aliens; I urgently request that this Congress take immediate steps to correct these serious situations as one of the musts of this state of emergency and total mobilization, for the protection of our way of life and our country's only real mass form of communication in the event of attack by an enemy.

Radio broadcasting is not only a must in every community during disaster, but it is a must in the general mobilization of our country.

The enactment of these two bills, first, will insure the immediate strengthening of our mass communication medium without the need of Government subsidization; second, will prevent the control of the radio networks from falling into the hands of aliens; third, will for the first time in radio history lessen the regulation of the individual radio stations licensed by the FCC; fourth, it will allow free and unrestricted commerce within the economic framework of the broadcasting industry; and fifth, it will allow the American public to hear many of the high quality radio programs which are now not heard by them.

Is this Congress cognizant of the fact that there is no legislation whatsoever to prevent the ownership and control of the radio networks by aliens, which networks control most of the programs broadcast over all of the major radio stations of our country?

This most serious situation, in this critical time of total mobilization and defense, calls for immediate action by our body.

AVAILABILITY OF COPIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET MESSAGE

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VORYS. How can Members of Congress obtain copies of the President's budget message? I have just been informed that copies will not be sent up from the Printing Office until 3 o'clock, and then maybe we can get them. I understand copies have been circulated to the press but, as is usual with Presidential messages, Members of Congress cannot obtain them. I happen to get things better in my mind through my eyes than through my ears. While I have sat here and tried to absorb this message, I should like to get a look at it. My inquiry is, when may Members of Congress be permitted to have copies of the budget message?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has information that they will be at the document room at 3 o'clock, they will be available then. They will be available to every Member as soon as they come from the Printing Office and are placed in the document room.

Mr. VORYS. Will they be delivered, or will we have to go get them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that they will be delivered. We will not have a session of the House tomorrow, so they will not be delivered to Members on the floor.

Mr. VORYS. My inquiry, then, turns into a request. May I ask our great Speaker if he can make it possible for Members who want to see the budget to get it without running around, and can he see that in the future Presidential messages are made available to Members at the time they are made available to the press and the public?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has hardly stated a parliamentary inquiry. He can send a page to the document room for a copy as soon as copies are made available.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. On that same question, Mr. Speaker, does that apply to the members of the Committee on Appropriations only? Where do we go to get our copies? Do we go to the document room?

The SPEAKER. All Members of the House are on the same footing, regardless of what committee they serve on.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think the point which the gentleman from Ohio seemed to raise, is that while Members of Congress may be on the same footing with each other we would like also to be on the same footing with people outside the Congress who receive copies of the message before we do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair might agree with the gentleman on that.

Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 30 minutes.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I come into the well of the House today with a heavy heart. My heart is heavy, not solely because our policies have failed to bring a just and lasting peace but heavy, because our leaders have sunk to a new low in an unholy effort to save face when confronted with diplomatic and military defeats. Mr. Speaker, they have within the last 36 hours embraced the principles of a Munich appeasement. On last Saturday, through the United Nations Truce Committee, our Government joined with other countries, in asking Red China to cease fire while its delegates could talk about a peace plan for Korea. This is abject surrender to appeasement. As a Member of this Congress, I am ashamed. For what purpose have our men in Korea died; for what purpose have our men in Korea suffered? Was it to appease aggressors in Asia and in Europe? My colleagues, what are you and I going to say to the wives, the mothers, and fathers of these men when they ask us: "What did our husbands and sons die for?" We had better prepare to answer that question.

Mr. Speaker, for a year or more the President has been telling the world how we hate the aggressors and dictators and how we love the free peoples everywhere. Indeed our love is so great that we will protect them at any cost, anywhere, at any time. Yet on last Saturday the President just brushed those promises under the rug when this Nation, under his leadership, forgot all about the free people of South Korea. Their representatives were not even invited to the meeting where their rights were being considered. And now if the cease-fire order is agreed to, the United States has promised to sit down with the Reds and consider the questions of Formosa and the admission of Chinese Communists to the United Nations. What a travesty on the simple principles of justice and fair dealing as our people understand them. Here is unqualified unadulterated appeasement in capital letters. Here again is another Yalta and Poland where appeasement motivated the principal actors. God help these United States under this kind of leadership.

Mr. Speaker, people all over this country are demanding a change in Truman's foreign policies. From my own congressional district, 95 percent of the letters received on this subject are violently opposed. Never in the years of my service in this body have my constituents been so bitter in their denunciation of our present leadership in foreign affairs. They demand that Secretary Acheson be fired; they ask for the impeachment of the President.

We cannot say, Mr. Speaker, that the people are not justified in the criticism they make today. They had a right to expect peace after a great military victory. That was the promise made to them; that was what our sons and daughters died for in 1941–45. They also had the right, Mr. Speaker, to expect capable leadership during the war to the end that when the war was over this country would be in a position to capitalize on its victory. Yet, while our military forces were fighting their hearts out on the battle fronts and while our farmers and workers in our industrial plants worked long hours to help our fighting men, the politicians were bargaining away the principles that were to make a just and lasting peace possible. Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam sealed the fate of the Christian world and today we face the Asiatic hordes of godless communism in a life-and-death struggle. We have temporized, we have repudiated the moral basis for our entry into World War II. We are today reaping the whirlwind. Another war is about to impose the garrison state upon us and with it the loss of our liberties and freedom.

People are bewildered; they are confused and Members of Congress cannot stand dumb and inert and place the responsibility upon the President alone. What to do, that is the question. It was Lincoln in his famous Springfield speech, when confronted with a critical situation said:

> If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do and how to do it.

Mr. Speaker, most people in this country know where we are. It is not a pleasant thought but our foreign policies have led us to the brink of another global war which calls for the sacrifice of human lives and the loss of billions of dollars. Since last June our young men have been giving their lives in a full-fledged war in Korea without congressional assent. All over the world, our policy has been to meet the thrust of communism. In Greece and Turkey, Yugoslavia, Western Europe, and Asia, the Truman doctrine to contain communism has been invoked. This has called for prolific spending of American dollars in the hope that our dollars would buy friendship. It has failed because we find in the United Nations a deep resentment and unfriendliness toward us. Those nations that have benefited most from our largess find they cannot go along with us now because of a conflict in their own national interests. So today we stand without friends in Western Europe, contrary to our hopes.

Soon, Mr. Speaker, we shall consider a plan for universal military service, the drafting of 18-year-old boys, and an acceleration of our industrial organization in the making of material for war. Attention is now focused on Western Europe and it seems that it is this administration's policy to send 50 or more divisions to defend countries in Europe whose people have no will to fight for their own freedom. This can only mean a commitment to engage mass armies on the continent. This will be a tragic mistake.

Mr. Speaker, the sad fact at this moment is that in two world wars this country was the principal force that upset the balance of power in the world. Prior to World War I and the last war, Russia was successfully contained by Germany and Japan. Now those bars are down permitting her to dominate one-third of the world's population. On its face there is no combination of free peoples, who are willing to fight, which can match the manpower and numerical strength of Russia and China. That is what we are up against today, Mr. Speaker.

If we are to engage the Russians, reinforced by the Chinese, in ground combat, we are hopelessly outnumbered. The lessons of Korea are sufficiently clear, Mr. Speaker, to convince even the rankest amateur, that the problem of fighting the Red army will be worse than fighting the Red Chinese in Korea. But as I have already intimated, the White House and the Pentagon have decided we must fight Russia in Europe with a great preponderance of the odds against us. At least that is the situation as I see it.

Mr. Speaker, there never was justification for the unauthorized war in Korea. When the North Koreans struck last June 25, there were only a few hundred American soldiers there and they were not equipped to fight. When the President, a few days later, ordered our men to fight it was murder, nothing less. The terrible nightmare of Korea haunts all of our people today. Our soldiers should come out of Korea; they have no business there after the main elements of our troops had been withdrawn.

Korea was untenable with China and Manchuria in the hands of the Communists, thanks to the support by Truman, Acheson, Marshall, Lattimore, Service, and others in behalf of the Red agrarian reformers. It was General Marshall who said that Korea was untenable under the circumstances I have mentioned. It was General Helmick who testified that in case of attack that "any troops that we have there would suffer another Bataan." Is this what we can expect at Pusan? God forbid, but it can happen. It was General Timberman who testified: "If we left troops in Korea, I do not think anyone would suggest we enter into combat with the Korean forces." How, then, did we enter into combat with them? General Timberman was asked as to our national security and how it was affected in Korea. He said it was not and then volunteered in part, "besides we might get into trouble later on, after we are in there militarily, which would be unfortunate." The general has, in view of the present situation in Korea, proved to be a prophet. I wonder if he was called to confer with the President when it was decided to fight the North Koreans? Generals Timberman and Hamilton and Admiral Woolridge all testified it would be unwise to keep troops in Korea. But all this sound advice was ignored by the President and the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, just as they ignored the recommendations of General Wedemeyer and our own colleague, Mr. Judd; and China went down. Korea is next. We cannot hold that peninsula against the overwhelming forces of Russian and Chinese Communist forces. It is the duty of the President to withdraw our troops from Korea so they may not suffer a Bataan or a Dunkerque. This is what our people are demanding.

The question now, Mr. Speaker, is what to do. In view of our desperate situation it is not unkind or unfair to suggest that our foreign policies for the past 5 years have failed. We need to make a new start. The hit-and-miss, day-by-day policy is inadequate for these times. We must have a long-range over-all policy to succeed against communism.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ally myself with Joseph P. Kennedy, Herbert Hoover, and Senator Taft in the suggestions they have made toward a new approach in United States foreign policy. Not all perhaps but some of all three suggestions are possible. The issue is pretty well drawn between these men on the one hand and Truman, Dulles, and Dewey on the other.

Since our entry into World War I in 1917, Mr. Speaker, Democrats have contended that our national security from the military standpoint rested in some other continent. We have been told that if we must fight, let us do it in some other country. That same argument was used in 1939–40 before World War II. We hear it again as another war is about to start. It is a fallacious argument as we discover that people overseas do not want their countries overrun in another war. There is no will to fight.

I have already alluded to the dangers inherent in a land war against the Russians and Chinese. Russia could strike with a thousand divisions were she to need them. Our 50 divisions in Europe and the reinforcements which we plan to rush there will, without a question, be sacrificed as expendable. We must lead from strength, through the air and on the sea, if we are to be successful. We are superior in these arms and we must use them. Day and night they can attack strategic bases in Russia from outside Europe and Asia. What we need is a strategy based on air power as the primary striking force. I do not pose as a military strategist but there are obvious basic considerations that must be clear to the most casual observer of events today.

Mr. Speaker, in all of the testimony that I have listened to as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, no one has ever suggested that we make an accurate survey of our national resources before starting on a dangerous venture such as we face today. This seems like a fundamental proposition to me, yet when it is suggested to Government witnesses as a starting point it is considered of no consequence and wholly irrelevant.

Is there anybody in the executive department or in Congress who can say with some degree of certainty that our resources are sufficient to justify great spending and fighting abroad and still more spending at home in support of another war? If not, why not? One man has well said:

Let us have a competent survey of our resources before it is too late. After appraising what we have in manpower, minerals, agriculture, electric power, and other resources, then we should ask what it is most important to defend.

He then goes on to say that most of us will agree:

(1) The United States; (2) North America; and (3) South America.

Then he suggests that we consider what resources we have left over after taking care of these three.

Our need then—

is for a survey committee, a competent group weighted with industrialists who have budgeted expertly for their own companies and faced bankruptcy as a penalty for error.

Mr. Speaker, it is futile to talk about promoting unity behind a policy that has failed. Our people have lost confidence in Mr. Acheson and they question the ability of the President to match his wits with Stalin. They will not unite behind a policy that insists upon an unauthorized and useless war in Korea. They will not unite behind a plan to send thousands of young men to Europe who can in no way successfully resist the Russian juggernaut when it starts to roll. There can be no unity behind a program to organize a land army of American boys to fight for nations who have no will to defend themselves. Wes Gallagher, AP foreign correspondent, in a recent dispatch said:

A large part of Europe hasn't the will to defend itself. On a grand scale, General Eisenhower is in the position of a football coach trying to instill the will to win in his team.

Is it unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, for the people in Britain and France to abhor the very real possibility of engaging in another war on their own soil? I think it is understandable. But I ask in all sincerity, is it our responsibility to needle them into action? I do not think so.

Mr. Speaker, in all humility I respectfully suggest a constructive program of action behind which a great majority of our people can unite:

First. The President should establish a Civilian Advisory Committee on National Defense with authority to investigate, counsel, and advise with him on all matters pertinent to our own security.

Second. The confidence of the people must be restored. This calls for the resignation of Secretary Acheson and all his policy makers in the State Department who are responsible for present policies.

Third. Order our troops out of Korea and establish a defensive perimeter from the Aleutians through Japan and south to Australia. On this line establish strong air and sea bases.

Fourth. Use the oriental technique of smuggling to undermine the Red Chinese in China. It can be done with American dollars and the help of the Nationalist Government on Formosa.

Fifth. Establish strong air and sea bases outside of continental Europe and in Alaska and Canada. Use Spain, its manpower and strategic position on the continent of Europe.

Sixth. Serve notice on Russia and Communist China that any aggressive move against a free nation will compel us to bomb important areas in those countries.

Seventh. Demand that the United Nations act to declare Chinese Communists as aggressors in Korea. Failure to respond would result in withdrawal of the United States from the United Nations organization.

Eighth. Uncertainty and indecision in official quarters has created an air of confusion and hysteria. If war is a possibility, then full mobilization is necessary—now.

Ninth. Write treaties of peace with Germany and Japan immediately.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA. I read in the morning paper that General Collins, Chief of Staff, announced that they were sending fresh troops into Korea. It may be that the gentleman has some information that he cannot disclose or some that he may be able to disclose. But, let me ask the gentleman this question: Assuming that we had a complete military victory in Korea, if you were to disregard the cost in human lives, what would it actually gain us? Would it not be something temporary in the way of a military victory, because I would assume that you would always have the threat of another horde of Chinese Communists coming over the border. Does the gentleman agree with me on that point?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Yes; I think the gentleman is right. So long as the mainland of Asia, which is China proper and Manchuria, is held by the Chinese Communists, any victory we achieve in Korea now is purely temporary.

Mr. O'HARA. Does the gentleman think that Congress should have something to say about the Korean War as well as the matter of sending troops to Europe?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I take the position, as I have said in my remarks, that Congress should have been consulted before we ever moved into Korea, because it is a war and not police action.

Mr. O'HARA. It is true we have not been consulted, but does not the gentleman think it is the responsibility of Congress to begin to exercise some judgment on Korea also?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I think this Congress, when it is called upon to consider appropriations for this venture, should look very closely on all requests that come through, for it follows that, once we appropriate, we approve whatever action that has been taken. Its legality thereafter cannot be questioned.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman one or two questions on one or two points he made. If the so-called intelligentsia of the Western European countries continue to so deeply feel that this American polyglot is kind of a semisavage, still Indian territory setup, and that they do not propose to accept our leadership, and that therefore they will not go along with the proposition of letting Europe be a fourth battlefield for our protection within a period of 40 years, on what grounds can we hope to make progress with them?

I say, if the so-called intelligentsia of Europe continue to maintain the position they have maintained, that they do not propose to accept our leadership militarily or otherwise, they do not propose to accept United States culture, because they substantially look upon us as pretty much of a bunch of savages yet, how are we going to make much progress over there whether we send 25 divisions or 100 divisions or 1,000 divisions? Will the gentleman give us the benefit of his comment on that point?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. That is a pretty big order. If the so-called intelligentsia continue to run the affairs of Europe, I do not see that there is much hope for us or for them, either.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield, I think what my colleague from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] means, if you boil it down, is, just how are you going to make those folks over there take something they do not want?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. They have been ready to take our money for a long time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I go a step further: We have an economic and financial concept here that was put down for the benefit of the 48 countries that came together, and by that I mean our 48 States. We run our show for the benefit of those 48 States, I mean politically, economically, financially, from a tariff standpoint, from an international trade standpoint, and all that goes with it. Here sit the prime ministers of those 48 countries, those 48 States. But Europe thinks of 48 countries. We sit here and think of something, we think of something on that plane, on that thesis, on that basis. How are you going to get the high intelligentsia of Europe, of France, of Belgium, of Spain, or of Luxemburg, to think as we do? We send General Eisenhower over there and they say, "What are you over here for, to impose the American philosophy on us? We do not want your enterprise system, we do not want your banking system, we do not want your political system. What are you doing over here? Why come over here and interfere with us all the time?" They are constantly afraid that we are going to try to shove our philosophy as related to these 48 States down their throats. That is why we do not have any friends in Europe today. I do not think we will have any friends of consequence as long as we go out here on the ground that we are God

Almighty and that we set ourselves up to lead the world and save the world.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observation. I agree with him.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I just want to congratulate the gentleman from Wisconsin on making a great speech.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. MACK of Washington. The columnists and commentators are referring to the discussion of our foreign policy as the great debate. If it is the great debate, the gentleman from Wisconsin has made an outstanding contribution to the discussion. I agree with a great deal of his speech because in it he said that Acheson ought to be dismissed and that we ought to get our troops out of Korea, with both of which propositions I agree.

I believe that there is more appeasement of Russia than the gentleman has mentioned. In the year 1949 the nations of Western Europe shipped to Russia and her satellites more than $1,000,000,000 worth of goods. Of that $1,000,000,000 worth of goods more than one-fifth, or more than $200,000,000 worth, from France, Britain, and Belgium, consisted of steel, iron, copper, lead, zinc, rubber, tin, ball bearings, and, yes, barbed wire. Does not the gentleman believe that this trade is going on between Great Britain, France, and Belgium, and Russia, the selling of war supplies to the enemy we are urging our people to fight, is an appeasement of Russia?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Absolutely. I referred to the fact that they are today, at this very moment, appeasing Communist Russia and the Communist Chinese.

Yesterday's newspaper carried a report that wherever rubber is produced, the British are selling it to the Chinese Communists. They are selling them all they can possibly produce. That is a highly inconsistent position to take, when the free nations assert they are against communism.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Is it not also a fact that the United States is buying vast quantities of goods, mostly luxury items, such as furs, crab meat, and caviar from the Russians, and supplying the Russians with dollars with which they are paying for the war goods that they are buying from Britain, France, Belguim, and other nations of Western Europe?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. That is correct.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I compliment the gentleman for his very able speech. I am in substantial agreement with everything the gentleman has said. Does not the gentleman feel that we are in this thing all over the world because of the fact that we have in power today in this Government of ours a group of people who believe to a great degree in the socialistic way of doing things and because of that we have given aid and comfort to socialism and to too great a degree to the communistic philosophy of government? In fact, we have many people in high places in Government today who, I am sure the gentleman will agree, have communistic leanings. That is being nice to them.

What can we expect in this international situation when we have here in America the philosophy, to a great degree, of the people who claim are our enemies. How can we be effective in trying to show the rest of the world that we really believe in peace and freedom and democracy?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Of course, the answer is obvious—you just cannot do it.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BUTLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Wednesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER WITH A LEGITIMATE GRIPE

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentlemen who have special orders, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute at this time and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MORRIS). If that is agreeable to the gentlemen having special orders, and if there is no objection, the gentleman may proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal about the criminal waste of money which Congress has appropriated for national defense and so forth. We understand that 82 percent of the billions Congress has appropriated for National defense since VJ-day has been spent for housekeeping and only 18 percent for armaments. I have just received a letter from a soldier in one of our training camps, which is good proof of what has been going on in this respect, hence today we have men training for war with little to train with. I will read the letter from this soldier. It is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I know you are a very busy man so I will try to make this as short as possible. They say a soldier is always griping, but having been in the Army only 4 months I couldn't swear as to the truth of that statement, but I do believe we, down here, have a few legitimate gripes.

I'm in a tank battalion in the Forty-fifth Infantry Division. There is only one tank battalion in the whole division. We at full strength are supposed to have 22 tanks in our company. We have three worn out M-4's in our company, so you can imagine how good our training can be with so many men trying to train on so few a number of tanks plus their being worn out so their operating efficiency is at a minimum. I fully realize our country is in a bad way as far as armed strength is concerned but it only makes common sense that if you are going to train a soldier you should at least give him something to train with. We cannot possibly become fully trained when we have such a lack of equipment and training aids as to make practical work impossible.

At the end of our inadequate day's training we have the happy thought of sleeping in a cold barracks.

I'm sure if you could but visit this camp you would see that these are not gripes but bare facts.

I fully realize that, this letter, if it does any good, won't help me, but it may help some of the men who will be following in my footsteps.

Mr. Speaker, I have omitted the soldier's name and camp for obvious reasons. I thank him for bringing this serious matter to my attention. I now direct it to the attention of Congress and especially to the Armed Services Committee of Congress for proper action.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative business of the day and any other special orders heretofore entered.

GOVERNING BY EAR

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, the Truman administration is not only playing by ear, but apparently expects Congress and the people to do it, too.

Here in the House we cannot get a copy of the budget message, so that we can see it while it is being submitted to the House. Apparently we are supposed to play the budget by ear. This morning a constituent called and asked for the details of the building freeze that was announced today, but effective last Saturday night. I was informed in the NPA office that, although the Executive order is in force now, I could not get a copy of it this morning; also, that relief from the freeze would be by application for a license, but the form of application was not available, as it had not been thought up yet.

Here we go again. Government by press release, oral statements, telephone information. Our forefathers sought a government of laws, not of men. We are getting more and more government by men, not of laws, and we cannot even see the words, the orders, that are to govern us.

We are all supposed to play by ear. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MORRIS). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, all of the Republicans from the Midwest I think will agree wholeheartedly with what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] said in his sound, constructive, and timely talk. The Midwest is in accord with what the gentleman said about the President and Secretary of State Acheson—I am wondering what the opinion of the gentleman from

Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] is on this proposition:

In my judgment, the Republicans have been just a little lukewarm, to put it charitably and kindly, toward the New Deal during the last 5 or 6 years, and also in that they have not made the fight they should have made against what the gentleman told us was coming. Have we been an active, constructive, aggressive opposition party?

What have you got to say about that, if you desire to comment? If you do not, we will just let it drift along, and I will say it for you.

There is no question about it. We have not. We have set back and let those fellows like Acheson and Hiss follow a policy which deep down in our hearts we knew was going to be ruinous. We ought to do a little sitting in sackcloth and ashes, and then get up and go at them, instead of drifting along as we have been doing. Over the years, dazed by their eloquence, befuddled by their bipartisanship, frightened by their false charges of lack of loyalty.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I yield.

Mr. O'HARA. I certainly want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that he is not one who has sat back and drifted along.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, yes, I have at times. There have been a great many times when I was not as great a nuisance to my colleagues as I should have been, and I am sorry for it, because, while I respect and admire my colleagues and want their good will, after all, my duty to my country comes first. I wish I had made it hotter for them than I have. Some say I have talked too much. In fact I have not said enough. At least I never was able to prod them into concerted effective action.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] said one thing with which I cannot agree. I do not think he, on further deliberation, will agree with it either. I am sorry. That is on point 7 of his program. If I understood him correctly, he said we should oppose admission of the Red Chinese to the United Nations. I think what the gentleman should have said was that we should let the United Nations go hang, and get out of there ourselves, if the rest of the folks want to take the Reds in. What is the use going along with an international organization which has been doing as the gentleman demonstrated, appeasing these Communists? Playing England's game?

I am warning the gentleman that his talk today, tomorrow, by the international, New Deal, Red radio commentators, columnists, editorialists, and their smear artists is going to be branded as cowardly appeasement; they will say that we should stand up and fight; no matter what the chances of success, no matter what the cost. They are going to say that we are cowards or that we lack the courage to fight, when the fact is the gentleman is exhibiting outstanding courage in opposing them when they insist upon the sacrifice of our American youth, perhaps in Europe, as they have been sacrificed in Korea, to no purpose. I have watched the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] for the last 10 years here in Congress, and I do not recall a single occasion when he has failed, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to point out our danger and to warn our people of what was coming. I regret, as I am sure he does, that his predictions have been so accurate. He told the Congress. It would not listen. Now the people are paying. But all the advice he has given has been disregarded, and we have gone along, following the Achesons and the Trumans, until today we are in a situation where now we must determine whether we are to destroy the security of the Republic by sending our resources and our men abroad until we have nothing left.

From the bottom of my heart I want to thank the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] for what he has said today for the clear over-all picture that he has given us of the situation in which we are now. I wish the Congress had followed his advice in the past.

Again from the bottom of my heart may I express the hope that my Republican colleagues will have the courage for once at least to take a stand and to think first of this country and express their thinking and their convictions through their votes here in the House in this next session. But again we are being squeezed here in the House because these appropriation bills are coming up. I would not vote one single cent to send our men across if it were not for the fact that we cannot desert those who are there and if we vote against appropriation bills we will be told, "You will not even vote to arm the men who are over there; you will not even vote to sustain those who are fighting now in this battle." So you see where we are. I wish there was some way by which we could curb the President in his stubborn, disastrous program of sending all our men abroad. I hope that a way may be found whereby we can separate, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], said, we can separate those appropriations which are needed to protect our own interests from those which are to be in furtherance of this program of internationalism.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. The first thing we shall have to do then will be to do away with the one-package appropriation bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am all for that, too.

Mr. JENSEN. Then we will have an opportunity to vote on domestic matters, on civilian matters and on military matters separately.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. With that I agree. What the gentleman means is so that Mr. Truman will be forced to do a little sacrificing on the domestic program and on Federal employee appropriations. That is what the gentleman is getting at.

Mr. JENSEN. Exactly. But we will not have a chance unless we can vote on each departmental appropriation bill separately.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. All right. I am with you on that. We might go one step further and support the gentleman in the other body who said we all should pay an income tax on the expense item which is now tax exempt. How do you like that?

Again, in behalf of my constituents, I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] for his clear, courageous, helpful talk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

SYNTHETIC AND NATURAL RUBBER

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the subject I wish to discuss is rubber, synthetic and natural rubber for the use of our military forces and civilian population. It may be well to review just for a moment the fact that during World War II the taxpayers of this country provided about $750,000,000 for the purpose of building a group of synthetic rubber producing plants in the United States so that we might protect ourselves insofar as rubber is required in every phase of our life. The capacity of those mills amounted to about 900,000 tons of synthetic rubber per annum, or that was what the production was brought up to during World War II. When we went into the conflict we had a few thousand tons of natural rubber on hand. The rubber-producing areas were controlled by the British, Dutch, and French combinations, trusts, you might call them. We either had to go into the production of synthetic rubber or shut down our transportation system.

After World War II was over, theoretically the question came up of disposing of those synthetic rubber plants to private industry. Many of us in both the House and the Senate protested against that disposal and felt that a certain number of those plants should be kept in production and that some of them should be kept in a stand-by position, that we should continue the production of synthetic rubber to the extent of about 275,000 tons per annum. So now we are down to the present emergency and some of us from this body and the other body, led by the whip of the other body, the gentleman from Texas, I believe it is now, have brought many of those plants back into production and we are again moving up toward the 900,000 tons of synthetic rubber production per annum. That will relieve our momentary situation and if we can get a few thousand tons of natural rubber into the country that will give us another lift.

Then we should go one step farther, and that is the real point I want to make today. When will the United States begin to produce natural rubber on a substantial scale? We have the land area, we have the climate, we have carried out sufficient experiments in the Southwest to know that we can do it. There is now a movement on foot to produce a great many thousand pounds of guayule rubber-plant seed.

The Munitions Board has added guayule seed and seedlings to the list of strategic and critical materials. I know that efforts have been afoot to have this done for at least 2 years. However, it took the combined efforts of the entire Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee to make the administration see the light and open the way to grow natural rubber in the United States in case our supplies from the Far East are reduced or shut off.

The final action in this matter by the Munitions Board was taken under its new chairman, John D. Small, who had been with the War Production Board and the Civilian Production Administration during World War II and the reconversion period immediately thereafter. It is apparent that this gentleman takes full cognizance of the fact so well expressed by Mr. Bernard Baruch in 1943 which closes with the statement, "Thus the rubber situation gives rise to our most critical problem."

Again with some strenuous urging by our former colleague now the junior Senator from Texas, Mr. LYNDON JOHNSON, we are endeavoring to produce as rapidly as possible every pound of synthetic rubber that our war-built synthetic producing plants are capable of turning out.

Gentlemen, synthetic rubber is good but it cannot take the place of natural rubber in all products as yet. We must have a substantial percentage, probably around 30 percent or more, natural rubber to support all-out synthetic-rubber consumption.

When it comes time for the House to act on that proposition, I hope that the necessary authorization and appropriation will be made for the production of this seed so that later on we can produce the plants and extract the raw rubber from those plants, thereby supplementing the synthetic rubber which we will produce in our synthetic plants.

If you will study the tonnage and poundage of rubber that is required for a military truck, for a military fighting machine that flies, or for your automobiles and trucks, and every other kind of implement or gadget which we use in military operation and which contains more or less rubber, you will find we simply have to have that rubber or we do not move. The railroads of this country are utterly incapable of carrying the tonnage which is necessary for peacetime and wartime production. That means we have to substantially rely on trucks to move the goods and the people. That means you must have enough natural rubber to go into truck tires in order to enable those trucks to travel at very high speed on the highways with extremely heavy loads on each axle. It further means that you have to put natural rubber in these truck tires. You do not have to have natural rubber in the automobile tires we use for touring purposes. A few weeks ago I took a set of tires off of my Buick automobile, strictly synthetic rubber, which I had driven over 35,000 miles. These casings are now being used by my boy on his so-called tin lizzy which he drives to school. He will probably put another 5,000 miles on those casings. They were made of synthetic rubber. But we do not have to carry heavy loads; we do not have to drive 75 miles an hour in our touring cars; but with trucks averaging 40 to 45 or 50 miles an hour on these long hauls, carrying from 10 to 30 tons of weight, they must have natural rubber in those tires.

There is no assurance that anybody can give that is worth a nickel that ships will clear from far-eastern ports—that is, the Dutch Malay Straits—with natural rubber from now on. I understand that the American military officials have ordered all of the American rubber-producing companies in the Far East to get out of that area such rubber as they have ready for shipment without any further delay. It is reasonable to assume that if hostilities break out on a big scale the ocean channels will be closed in that part of the area and what natural rubber we may have on hand at that moment and have moving that has cleared the submarine area will be about the only natural rubber we will have for some time.

So these statements I have made are strictly in the interest of getting more natural rubber for the use of our people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from California [Mr. YORTY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, this Congress is engaged in what has been termed "The Great Debate." It was launched by a former President and almost every day since some member of the Republican Party has emphatically displayed the wide diversity of opinion existing among leaders or spokesmen of that party. There is, in a sense, no debate at all. Instead we are hearing a series of political speeches made with a view toward 1952, at a time and in a manner likely to further confuse our own people and our allies. We are compelled under the circumstances to be curious as to just what policy or whose policy the Republicans are recommending and to wonder why they do not hold a caucus, settle their wide differences, adopt a definite policy, and then present that policy in an orderly way instead of using a sort of Tower of Babel approach. How can we adopt a bipartisan foreign policy that will give us the unity circumstances require while the Republican leaders are recommending many different policies and each one implies that adoption of a policy other than his own will not be bipartisan enough to enlist his support and acquiescence. Is there any one spokesman who can clearly state the present Republican policy in foreign affairs? Is it the isolationism of the former President, the semi-isolationism of the Senator from Ohio, the militance of the titular head of the party, the boldness of the Senator from California, or the positive approach espoused by Mr. Dulles or Mr. Stassen? Is it the policy of the Republican Party that we leave Korea, which seems to be the view of the Senator from Ohio, or that we stay in accordance with the view of the Senator from New Hampshire whom the Republicans have recently placed on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee?

No, Mr. Speaker, we are not witnessing a debate. We are witnessing a seminar. The theory of isolationism might have provided material for a debate in another era long past, but inexorable fact has exploded the theory completely although it creeps up as a sort of infantile emotional desire for an easy way out when we find ourselves perplexed by the heavy burden or responsibility fate places upon us. Having twice within a few decades been forced to liberate Europeans from evil, predatory conquerors, both for their sake and our own, we dare not allow our yearning for tranquillity to hypnotize us into thinking that we need not meet the menace until all the rest of the free world has been shackled and enslaved.

No matter how much we dislike the prospect, we all know almost instinctively that when the fatal hour strikes we will not stand idly by and watch the decent people of the world ruthlessly ravaged. If we squarely face this fact now, the frustration stemming from indecision will dissipate and we will begin to act like the proud, courageous people which we are capable of being. Surely a just God would never confront us with an evil challenge without also giving us the strength to meet it, provided we are willing to carry our cross and accept necessary sacrifices until freedom arises again wherever it has been trammeled. Have we lost faith in God or the justice of our cause? How can we doubt that we will ultimately win this struggle, the outcome of which will vitally affect the lives of our own children and the generations following after them? We have no intelligent alternative. Our choice is made. We must lead the forces of freedom and we must and we will win. If the lustful war lords choose to expand the war they are waging against us they will ultimately learn that the demoralizing theory of the dialectics of materialism is erroneous—that the free will exercised in accordance with conscience gives man strength and control over his own destiny within the limits prescribed by the laws of the universe; that freemen inspired by the love of liberty will never cease fighting fiercely against any force that threatens to degrade them, to destroy their individual dignity or their right to experience a relatively short span of life on this whirling sphere free from arbitrary and tyrannical restraint.

If we face the facts, we can remove from the area of debate any question of our firm resolve to stand side by side with our fellow men to block the path of the aggressor. Our assignment in the struggle then becomes primarily a matter of military decision to be based upon the capabilities and capacities of the units making up the total available forces. We can trust our military leaders to see that our Armed Forces carry no more than their fair share of the burden and that they are deployed in a manner best calculated to deter or defeat aggression, provided we leave to them the military decisions which they are singularly qualified to make.

Political policies must, of course, be determined by Congress. In order to unify the Nation, the executive branch should be extremely careful to avoid overstepping its rightful constitutional authority. For instance, if the North Atlantic Pact leaves any reasonable doubt as to the right of the President to deploy air, ground, or naval forces in Europe, that doubt should be cleared up at once in cooperation with the Congress. We can ill afford to allow such an important matter to become the cause of interminable controversy.

It seems hollow to me to argue that the President would have the power of deployment in the event of war, but not now, when in fact we are already at war. What are we fighting in Korea if not one phase of the battle for Asia? It took General MacArthur's brilliant defeat of the North Korean puppets to unmask for even the most reluctant nonbelievers the solidarity of the Kremlin's forces of whatever race or nationality, and their willingness to resort to war to achieve their evil ends. It is evident that the Kremlin conquerors, as part of their world-wide plot, intend to drive all western influence out of Asia and to enslave the peoples of the entire continent. The conclusive proof of their world-wide designs is in plain view for all who are willing to see.

Twelve years ago, as chairman of the California State Committee on Un-American Activities, I came to the conclusion that the Kremlin was bent on world conquest. I have never had reason to doubt this, except for a brief interval after the war when I dared hope that their policy was shifting somewhat. There is not a country where their stealthy and cunning advance agents are not directing groups of native traitors. Everywhere they are spreading vicious propaganda, working to confuse and frighten their intended victims.

We all know that some of our allied nations were internally undermined almost to the point of collapse before we gave them sufficient help to enable courageous leaders to unite majorities determined to remain free. At this time, we must use great care lest our actions demoralize or discourage people living in the ominous presence of powerful, threatening armies. In their struggle to prepare their defenses, they must be assured of our unwavering support.

Irresponsible statements made here are certain to be fully utilized by the Kremlin's propagandists.

Mr. Speaker, we all recognize the fact that no man's judgment is any better than the information upon which it is based. Right now, we would all have more confidence in our judgment if we knew we understood the true facts. For military reasons, it is obvious we cannot be advised in advance of plans like the Inchon landing, which brought victory over the North Koreans from the brink of apparent defeat.

I find many phases of the war in Korea puzzling. Having served in the Air Forces and having been subjected to bombing, I am amazed that any army can sustain an offensive with no air support, against a well-equipped opponent possessing full control of the air. We may ask just what are we now trying to accomplish in Korea? It would have strategic value as a beach head on the continent, if we were prepared to vigorously expand and extend it, but we are not even permitting our Air Force to support our infantry by bombing enemy supply depots outside of Korea. Under such circumstances we are fighting under most disadvantageous conditions. Korea has proved that we will fight. It has also proved, beyond further doubt, that the Communists under the Kremlin are one unit, and that they will fight where the advantage is in their favor. Korea has roused us from our lethargy. It has started us on the road to the preparedness which is our only hope for security. For this, our people have paid an awesome price. Surely no deceptive peace overtures will again lull us back to sleep and cause us to slacken our defense efforts. Surely we can disengage our divisions in Korea and still continue to build our strength to where we will not need to worry about loss of face, consider seating another cynical aggressor in the United Nations, or handing over a strategically located island, which is a vital link in our outer defense chain.

It seems obvious that, whether or not we can hold on in Korea, we certainly cannot consider leaving the same divisions there indefinitely. Yet no one seems inclined to send fresh divisions to relieve them. If we are not going to, or cannot, relieve them, we surely should get them out now. They have brought honor to themselves and their flag. They can depart with their heads high. This is only the first round. We need not listen to the defeatists among us who are ready to throw in the sponge and write off all of Europe without even a fight, because Korea has proved a bitter experience. They argue that, because we are not fully prepared now, any effort to get strong will cause the Kremlin's forces to attack before we are ready. This is actually arguing that we should resign ourselves and our children to a life of abject fear. Such defeatism is unworthy of a great nation. If the Kremlin were confident of its ability to succeed, I think it would attack Europe and the Middle East at once. Only the Kremlin knows its own weaknesses. Ours are pointed out daily.

Historically, I am told, Russian armies have stockpiled heavily before hostilities. This would be more important now with their factories and supply lines vulnerable to air attacks. It may very well be that we can use our superior industrial power to reach a security level of preparedness before the Kremlin feels able to risk full scale hostilities. At any rate, we have no choice. It is our only hope for avoiding full scale war. We must, in this Congress and throughout this Nation, conduct ourselves with such resolution that the oppressed everywhere will take heart and dare to hope that if they strive faithfully, God will point the way to a better day. Ours is a tremendous responsibility. Like our forefathers, we will pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor—we will not let freedom perish from the earth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the printing of my remarks the table which I have prepared and which is part of my statement may appear in tabular form.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, so that it may be easy to understand, I have prepared a little table that shows what the President's budget does:

Carry-over from 1950	$13,000,000,000
Appropriation for 1951	88,668,000,000
	101,668,000,000
Estimated expenditures, 1951	47,210,000,000
Carry-over to 1952	54,458,000,000
1952 estimates, net	94,429,000,000
	148,887,000,000
Estimated expenditures	71,594,000,000
Balance to be spent after 1952	77,293,000,000

The estimates for civilian activities have very generally been increased, although there are some minor exceptions. Items are included for very large amounts for medical aid and for aid to education. It is very evident that there is lots of work for the Appropriations Committee, and that the opportunities for cuts and savings were never better.

The military item estimated request is $62,000,000,000 for 1952, with $10,000,000,000 remaing to be asked in 1951. Never before, even in wartime, have we failed to have a budget for military expenditures submitted when the Congress met. The budget for 1952 contains no detail for the committee to work with. I assume it will come later.

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

PORTLAND, OREG., January 12, 1951.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with your designation of me, pursuant to House Resolution 49, Eighty-second Congress, adopted by the House of Representatives, to administer the oath of office to Representative-elect HOMER D. ANGELL, of the Third District of Oregon, I hereby report that on the 12th day of January, 1951, at Portland, State of Oregon, I administered the oath of office to Mr. ANGELL, form prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being the form of oath administered to Members of the House of Representatives, to which Mr. ANGELL subscribed.

Respectfully,

JAMES ALGER FEE,
Chief Judge, United States District
Court for the District of Oregon.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 69), which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas HOMER D. ANGELL, a Representative from the State of Oregon from the Third District thereof, has been unable to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed to the oath of office before Hon. James A. Fee, United States district judge for the district of Oregon, authorized by resolution of this House to administer the oath, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said HOMER D. ANGELL as a Member of this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative business of the day and any other special orders heretofore entered.

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great many speeches today and in the immediate past about the international situation and about what we should do for mobilization and bringing both political parties together in greater harmony. Some of the Members of this House have tried to answer some of these questions, or have at least asked preliminary questions which might give us the answers to the basic questions more thoroughly than we have such answers at the present time.

I have here a statement which was drawn up, with the cooperation of both Republicans and Democrats, with the idea of trying to bring to a head some of the things beneficial to our country. A great majority who participated in this work have the feeling that this is a good statement and expressed at least our ideas. It is as follows:

To assist in the defense of our country we join together to state our opinions on matters which we feel require immediate action by Congress.

We feel that we need more information on the degree of self-help being experienced in Europe to resist Soviet imperialism, our specific foreign policies in the areas of the world in greatest danger, the requirements of military and economic aid in those areas, the priorities of strategic importance among those areas, the ability of the United States to respond to financial and military programs which are required to assist our allies in the present circumstances, what domestic services now rendered by our Government can be eliminated or curtailed during the present emergency as a means of giving our country the additional strength required by the international situation, and what can be done to utilize more fully America's manpower in tasks which face this country.

In order to secure this information we are sponsoring two resolutions which have been introduced today. One would direct the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ascertain and report on specified matters relative to international affairs and the other would establish a select committee to report on functions of the Federal Government which can be eliminated or severely curtailed in the present emergency and also upon manpower problems of the Federal Government.

The first of these resolutions is specific but the resolution on the select committee is necessarily general in nature, as the committee is expected to develop places for curtailment which may not be obvious to the average Congressman.

We believe that the request of the President for rigid economy in these times will be accomplished by the standing committees of the House with whatever assistance they can secure from other agencies. However, the resolution introduced today is primarily concerned with curtailing or postponing nondefense activties. Illustrations of places where economies could be effected by great reductions or curtailment of activities when not connected with defense are in such programs as the following: Housing, agriculture, harbor development, reclamation, roads, public printing, Government public relations, etc.

We hope that the committee can develop more efficient utilization of Government manpower. For instance, we recommend that the work week of Federal employees be increased commensurate with the mobilization effort (as it should also be in private enterprise), and that vacations be standardized throughout Government service on a basis comparable with private enterprise. The increased working days would provide Government workers with increased income and would lessen the requirements for additional Government personnel to meet the present emergency.

The two resolutions which have been mentioned do not cover all aspects of the defense effort required in the present emergency. There are other matters related to mobilization which have been omitted because they are in active consideration by committees in he House at the present time. For example, we believe that the danger of world war is imminent and, having accepted such premise, that our present national effort is not sufficient; that substantially all of the National Guard should be immediately mobilized and that industrial mobilization should be speeded up so that necessary arms and equipment can be furnished such units; that all able-bodied military personnel now involved in "housekeeping" duties in desk, recruiting, and training positions should be reassigned and replaced by those less fit physically; that serious consideration should be given to the establishment of a foreign legion in which recruits from all over the world would be enlisted and to permitting the Japanese and Germans to rearm for their own defense and as bulwarks against the spread of communistic aggression; that deferments for gifted students in American colleges should be available only for students pursuing courses of practical value to the defense efforts; that there should be fewer rejections in the selective service; that wage and price controls should be imposed without delay; that, in order to pay for the needed outlays and to assist in combatting inflation, despite such savings as can be made, it is essential that taxes be very substantially increased or substantial new sources of taxation developed.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point of my remarks a resolution which I wish to read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. The resolution on elimination of nondefense expenditures reads as follows:

Resolution Creating a Select Committee to Conduct An Investigation and Study of the Activities of the Government During the Existing National Emergency

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee to be composed of 11 Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, one of whom he shall designate as chairman. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

The committee is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of (1) all activities of the Government, to determine which activities, not essential to the national defense, should be terminated or curtailed during the existing national emergency, and to determine ways of performing more efficiently and economically other activities of the Government, and (2) manpower problems of the Government to determine ways of more effectively utilizing such manpower.

The committee is authorized to coordinate its activities with other committees of the House so as to evade duplication of effort and shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof authorized by the committee to hold hearings, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within or outside the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

From now on my remarks are going to be my own entirely, although they will have a bearing upon what I have already said of our joint efforts.

It is the thought of these Congressmen who gathered together to study this particular situation that there are many fields of Government activity and service which could be eliminated entirely. We do not see any particular reason, for instance, why there should be any public relations work done in various branches of the Government, as for example in the Veterans' Administration and particularly in the branches of the armed services when everybody is being called by Selective Service anyway. There seems to be very little reason for recruiting work of that kind at this time. Every Congressman receives many publications to distribute amongst his constituents. That is a very fine thing in ordinary times, but the expense of sending them out and the expense of compiling them seems to us to be inconsistent with the defense needs of our country.

I represent a district which has flood control and harbor projects. There are many like me. Some of those projects probably come within the scope of the national defense effort but we all know that tremendous sums of money could be saved by the elimination of some of those projects during this crucial time whenever the particular projects are not connected with the national defense efforts. If that policy could be established and rigidly carried out, I am sure we would all cooperate, for then we could say that we had done the best we could, consistent with a policy of defense priorities. Another field, that of agriculture, seems to be one where great reductions in costs can be effected and portions of the programs eliminated for the purpose of this emergency. If we eliminated the Federal finances which were not necessary to the national defense, hundreds of millions of dollars could be saved. Another field where immense savings could be made is that of public roads. Good roads are very important, of course, for the development of our country, but we know that much of what is being done today could be eliminated or curtailed for the time being at least.

We have pointed out some improvements which could be made in the field of working hours, and they should be carried out in this time of national emergency. They would help in problems which face the Post Office and Civil Service Committee right now. At the present time there are great inequities between the various branches of our Federal Government. Some people receive a 4-weeks vacation, some receive 2; some receive different benefits from others in practically the same fields.

Before I close my remarks I would like to say a word about this very important resolution on foreign affairs, which has been introduced. It deals with finding out the facts with regard to our international situation so that we will have more facts to go on and less talk. It seems to me we should be getting together in order to work out the proper solutions that we can find. There should be less talk about disunity, there should be less talk about criticizing any particular person. After all, this Congress has the power to do everything which we desire to do if we will just take the initiative. We should not be talking about politics in times like these and we should not be making our speeches for the purpose of getting votes back home or for the purpose of doing anything except to try to strengthen our country. It is for that purpose that these young men got together in an effort to bring forth these two resolutions and the statement included in the first part of my remarks.

There undoubtedly are imperfections in them. They may not be well founded in some respects; however, we have done the very best we could. Perhaps some of the information called for cannot be made available to the general public, perhaps cannot be made available to the Congress as a whole, but the committees should study these things so that we may have a better foundation upon which to build our future strength.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I want to commend the distinguished gentleman from Florida upon his forthright statement and for his effort to cut civilian expenses as far as that may be done. I join with him in his suggestion and in his proposal that all expenditures of Government outside of the military be cut to the bone and that no expenditures be approved except those that are absolutely necessary to carry on the work of these agencies and funds that are required to carry on the defense program.

I also want to commend the gentleman for his views in respect to the use of personnel in our Government. We should not have more personnel in any of our agencies than is absolutely necessary. The expenditures for our civilian agencies should be made in the light of absolute need and for such funds as are required to carry on the defense program.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. I thank the gentleman for his comments and I would like to commend him on the resolution he has introduced to bring about savings with reference to the work of the Hoover Commission, and having such a commission made a permanent matter. I heard his speech the other day, and it was a very splendid one. His resolution is a good one.

I do not think the proposals made in the resolution I introduced overlap those of the gentleman from Kansas. I think the proposals supplement each other. The gentleman's effort is to cut out unnecessary and wasteful expenditure in Government which to a certain extent may overlap this, but the primary objective of this resolution is to cut out services now rendered by the Government in this present emergency when such services are unnecessary in our effort to give our country greater strength.

Mr. REES of Kansas. They can be worked out together.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to compliment the gentleman on his very fine statement. I think the Congress and the people should know that the distinguished gentleman from Florida was the moving spirit and the moving force which brought about this very fine statement. I hope through the action he has taken that we will have a speeding up of effort in our mobilization program.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a resolution with regard to foreign affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The resolution referred to on foreign affairs is as follows:

Whereas in order to successfully implement our foreign policy, it is imperative that the Government have the confidence and support of the citizens of the United States; and

Whereas reverses suffered by the United Nations in Korea and the imminent danger of another world war, have caused the people of this country to become vitally concerned as to whether or not the foreign policy being pursued by the United States is one that will insure the security of our country and our democratic form of government, and lead to a lasting peace; and

Whereas since the end of World War II Congress has ratified the United Nations Charter, committing the United States to collective security measures; the North Atlantic Pact, committing the United States to the mutual defense of the member nations; and did in 1949 pass the foreign military aid bill to implement the North Atlantic Pact; and

Whereas resultant actions taken by the United States in furtherance of the aims and objectives of the United Nations and under the North Atlantic Pact have been the subject of acrimonious attack by many citizens, including some Members of this body; and

Whereas the Congress is concerned with effecting a clarification of our foreign policies and the reasons therefore, including, but not limited to, those involving Europe, the Middle East, and Asia; and

Whereas the criticism, if untrue, directed toward various members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for not making a comparable effort with the United States in the defense of Western Europe is harmful to a unified defense against communism; and

Whereas the Soviets have been conducting an increasingly bitter propaganda campaign against the United States, thereby necessitating an increased effort on our part to inform the peoples of the world that our cause is the preservation of peace, freedom, and justice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives is forthwith directed to investigate and report to the House of Representatives, at the earliest practicable date, specific findings of fact and recommendations concerning the following:

1. Whether or not the North Atlantic Pact signatories are making a military and economic effort comparable with that of the United States to defend Western Europe against Soviet imperialism, and whether or not there exists throughout Western Europe, including Western Germany, a determined will to resist vigorously any attack.

2. Our specific foreign policies in Western Europe, the Mediterranean area, the Middle, Near, and Far East, together with an estimate of the military and economic aid required to fully implement such policies.

3. The areas in the world which are of such strategic importance that their subjugation by Russia would seriously impair the ability of the United States to defend itself, together with an analysis of the relative priority that should be accorded such area.

4. Whether or not the United States is conducting an adequate program to convince the peoples of the world, both within and without the Soviet sphere of influence, that our cause is the preservation of peace, freedom, and justice.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, may I say in conclusion that perhaps some things which I have said may not meet with the entire approval of all of the membership of the group of Congressmen I mentioned, but these young men have worked together in an effort to bring out the things that have been brought out. Some of the suggestions made in my speech, which was unprepared, may not represent everything I have in mind, but all of the young men who worked together on this are young men who put their country ahead of their reputation, ahead of their own personal desires, and we are trying to make an effort to give whatever impetus we can to strengthening our country.

INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, today, the American people are being called upon to make great sacrifices to defend our cherished freedom. Thousands of our young men have given their lives in Korea to stop Communist aggression, and in furtherance of our policy, and that of the United Nations, to preserve peace, freedom, and justice for the liberty-loving peoples of the world. Many more of our young men will be called to arms in order to adequately prepare our country for a global conflict that may be precipitated at any time by Russia. The citizens of the United States will be called upon this year to pay higher taxes and to make numerous other sacrifices for the defense of America, and to implement our foreign policy.

We, in Congress, if we are to have the confidence of the people must ourselves have a deep conviction that the policies to which we commit our country will insure the security of America and a lasting peace. We, ourselves, must have confidence in our foreign policy. The acrimonious debate in Congress is indicative of the fact that there are widely divergent opinions throughout the country which must be harmonized into a unified effort.

Our policy, in general, has been to create situations of strength throughout the world to enable the free peoples everywhere to resist communism. In pursuing such a policy will we so weaken our domestic economy that we are unable to fully protect ourselves? How much military and economic aid will be required to fully and effectively implement our policy of making all countries strong outside the Soviet orbit? If the Soviets instigate a series of Korea incidents around the Soviet periphery tomorrow, as they are fully capable of doing, we will be confronted with numerous decisions which cannot possibly be made intelligently without a thorough analysis of many factors.

How much military and economic effort would be required of us to successfully resist the subjugation of Yugoslavia through a Soviet-directed attack by the satellites? How much military and economic aid would be required to insure that the rubber supply of Malaya does not fall to the Communists through a Viet Minh offensive, supported by the Chinese Communists? Would the loss of the Malay States or of Jugoslavia seriously impair our ability to defend ourselves? Is it wiser to scatter our strength throughout the world or should our energies be directed to the full support of strategic areas, in order of their priority, which are necessary to the preservation of our freedom?

All of these questions and many more are running through my mind and I am sure they are running through the minds of many of our citizens.

In the hope of obtaining these answers and to insure the confidence and support of all citizens of the United States in our foreign policy, I introduced, this morning, the following resolution:

Whereas in order to successfully implement our foreign policy, it is imperative that the Government have the confidence and support of the citizens of the United States; and

Whereas reverses suffered by the United Nations in Korea, and the imminent danger of another world war, have caused the people of this country to become vitally concerned as to whether or not the foreign policy being pursued by the United States is one that will insure the security of our country and our democratic form of government, and lead to a lasting peace; and

Whereas resultant actions taken by the United States in furtherance of the aims and objectives of the United Nations and under the North Atlantic Pact have been the subject of acrimonious attack by many citizens, including some Members of this body; and

Whereas the Congress is concerned with effecting a clarification of our foreign policies and the reasons therefore, including, but not limited to, those involving Europe, the Middle East, and Asia; and

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives is forthwith directed to investigate and report to the House of Representatives, at the earliest practicable date, specific findings of fact and recommendations concerning the following:

1. Whether or not the North Atlantic Pact signatories are making a military and economic effort comparable with that of the United States to defend Western Europe against Soviet imperialism, and whether or not there exists throughout Western Europe, including Western Germany, a determined will to resist vigorously any attack.

4. Whether or not the United States is conducting an adequate program to convince the peoples of the world, both within and without the Soviet sphere of influence, that our cause is the preservation of peace, freedom, and justice.

With this information before us, I feel sure that all of us, as sincere Americans, seeking to preserve peace, will make sound decisions that will have the confidence of all our people.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, in a world filled with the clamor of those who trust in violence and with the boasting of those who reckon not with the ultimate supremacy of forces unseen and eternal, save us from being victims of the apparent and the transient. Help us to command this new day, meeting its joys with gratitude, its difficulties with fortitude, its doubts with faith no darkness can extinguish. Direct our steps, guard us from error, deliver us from all evil. Help us to sit where others sit, seeing life's tangled skein through the eyes of those less fortunate than ourselves. And in dark and dangerous days may we still be able to utter the glad and grateful confidence: "Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident: The Lord is my light and my salvation; the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid." Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 15, 1951, was dispensed with.

RESOLUTIONS OF NATIONAL RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a copy of the resolutions adopted by the National Reclamation Association at its nineteenth annual meeting at Spokane, Wash., last November.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Foreword)

The resolutions contained herein are the latest public expression of the western people with regard to their reclamation problems.

Spokane, Wash., was host to the National Reclamation Association membership during its nineteenth annual meeting, November 15, 16, and 17, 1950. This meeting, again, presented an opportunity for reclamation people from the 17 Western States to discuss and act upon their mutual problems.

Our annual meeting was one of the most successful ever held by the National Reclamation Association. "Grass roots" speakers representing irrigation districts from seven regions in the West had their day on the program. A majority of those present throughout the meeting were officers and directors of irrigation districts, canal and ditch companies, as well as officers and directors of the 17 Western State organizations. Thus, these resolutions are the voice of representatives of the water users on the land.

The resolutions were first considered and approved by a committee made up of one member from each of the Western States. The resolutions were then submitted to each of the State caucuses for full consideration, after which they were acted upon by the convention membership as a whole.

We submit this program for the West as a constructive, forward step in continued western reclamation development.

We earnestly solicit your support in furthering the advancement of this worth-while cause.

Respectfully submitted.

HARRY E. POLK,
President.
WM. E. WELSH,
Secretary-Manager.

Resolution No. 1

BASIN DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE REPORT

Whereas during recent years a trend has developed toward the obtaining and assertion by agencies of the United States of increasing governmental power over the development of water resources and the economy of the 17 Western States, and the control and authority of the States and their agencies over their own future welfare has been correspondingly diminishing; and

Whereas still further extensions of Federal domination over the welfare and economy of the West have been proposed and advocated in connection with a movement to establish Federal valley authorities in the river basins of the Western States; and

Whereas for obvious reasons the National Reclamation Association has rejected the Federal valley authority concept as having no proper place in the American system of Government; and

Whereas it is recognized by the association that the most effective and beneficial utilization of the water resources of the West can be obtained through coordinated, basin-wide planning and development; and

Whereas in order that the association should undertake its proper responsibility for leadership of public opinion, in relation to basin-wide development, the president of the association has appointed a special basin development committee and said committee has submitted to the association its report, wherein it makes affirmative proposals for solution of problems of basin development: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, by the National Reclamation Association:

1. That the association approves the broad, general objectives laid down in the report of the basin development committee as indicated by the preamble of this resolution;

2. That the association deems it essential that the trend toward Federal domination be reversed;

3. That the basin development committee report be transmitted to each of the 17 affected States and interested organizations and agencies, and the interested Federal agencies for study, review, and comment within a time fixed by the board of directors;

4. That the comments of such States, organizations, and agencies be studied and analyzed by the board of directors, and that its analysis and recommendations be submitted to the twentieth annual meeting of the National Reclamation Association; and

5. That the National Reclamation Association expresses its appreciation to Chairman Marshall Dana and his fellow committeemen for their untiring and fruitful efforts in the study and preparation of the project report.

VALLEY AUTHORITIES

Whereas the National Reclamation Association by its Resolution No. 4, adopted in 1938; Resolution No. 17, adopted in 1941; Resolution No. 15, adopted in 1943; Resolution No. 15, adopted in 1944; Resolution No. 21, adopted in 1946; Resolution No. 15, adopted in 1947; Resolution No. 13, adopted in 1948; and Resolution No. 4, adopted in 1949, has consistently and emphatically registered its opposition to all proposals for creation of so-called valley or regional Federal authorities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That said association does hereby again reaffirm its position as outlined in the above-mentioned resolutions in opposition to the creation of Federal valley or regional authorities and administrations.

Resolution No. 3

BASIN ACCOUNT

Whereas varying proposals have been made as to the establishment of a so-called basin account in one or more river basins for the general purpose of pooling revenues from reclamation and power projects for use in financing such projects; and

Whereas question has been raised as to the propriety of some such proposals, and the Congress has not enacted them; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That the president of the association is directed to appoint a committee for the purpose of studying such proposals and reporting as promptly as possible to the board of directors of the association whether and under what circumstances, and for what purposes and with what provisions such basin account proposals should be supported by the association.

Resolution No. 4

WATER RESOURCES POLICY COMLIISSION

Whereas the President of the United States, on January 3, 1950, appointed a Water Resources Policy Commission and directed it to study and report to him by December 1, 1950, upon the general subject of national water resources policy; and

Whereas the report of said Commission is expected to contain recommendations relating to subjects of particular interest to the National Reclamation Association: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That the president of the association is directed to appoint a committee for the purpose of studying the final report of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission and any action which may be taken by the Eighty-second Congress thereon, and of reporting to the board of directors of the association from time to time its recommendations relating to said report.

9 (E) CONTRACTS

Whereas the National Reclamation Association by its Resolution No. 4 adopted in 1947, Resolution No. 1 adopted in 1948, and Resolution No. 1 adopted in 1949 has consistently opposed the use of contracts made under section 9 (e) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 for the purpose of placing the United States, through the Bureau of Reclamation in the business of operating as a public utility for the sale of irrigation water; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association supports congressional legislation assuring water users organizations contracting with the United States through the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the Federal Reclamation Laws, the right to acquire permanent water rights and control of their distribution facilities.

JOINT LIABILITY

Whereas it is the general policy of the Department of the Interior to require, pursuant to existing law, that there be incorporated in contracts with irrigation districts for furnishing water, a clause making owners of land under any irrigation project jointly liable for the repayment of construction costs and the costs of furnishing water; and

Whereas it now appears there are some areas proposed for development within the 17 reclamation States, wherein operators refuse to accept any plan or contract that requires "joint liability"; and

Whereas there are projects functioning successfully without the inclusion of the "joint liability" clause; and

Whereas such policy was referred to in the Special Repayment Commission report sent to the United States House of Representatives on May 18, 1938 (H. Doc. No. 873) in these words, * * * "It fails in its purpose, particularly on projects which have soils of varied production power. * * * One serious result of joint liability on reclamation projects is the discouragement and mental depression of landowners whose assessments are increased because others do not pay * * * many financial agencies refuse to make loans on project lands, even though the individual farmer is a first-class risk"; and

Whereas experience has since proven that this policy, incorporated in section 45 of the act of May 25, 1926, and in section 9 (d) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939, has failed to obtain the desired results: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the inclusion in future contracts of a joint liability clause should be optional with the contracting organization and that existing laws with respect thereto should be so amended.

APPLICATION OF 160-ACRE LIMITATION TO DEVELOPED PRIVATE LANDS

Whereas the 160-acre limitation prescribed by the Reclamation Act of 1902 represents a valid Federal policy, as applied to the public lands for which the law was originally designed; and

Whereas on the other hand, as applied to privately owned lands for which a supplemental water supply is to be furnished, and which private lands have already been developed by irrigation, and have as a result of decades of trial and error established economic patterns of development suitable to their conditions, said 160-acre limitation does not have validity, nor in fact represent any Federal policy at all, since other Federal laws relating to water-resources development do not contain this limitation; since it is not embraced in any of the general laws relating to assistance of farmers by farm support prices and like benefits, and since there have been repeated special exemptions from the limitation in respect to particular reclamation projects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That, reaffirming its Resolutions No. 6, adopted in 1944; No. 3, adopted in 1946; and No. 21, adopted in 1946, as applied to supplemental water projects for developed private lands which have established patterns of economy through decades of irrigation experience, the acreage limitation of the reclamation law is unjust and unworkable, and said association again urges that the Congress enact legislation repealing said acreage limitation as to such lands.

Resolution No. 8

SUBJECTION OF ALL FEDERAL AGENCIES TO STATE WATER LAWS

Whereas by section 8 of the Reclamation Act of 1902 the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of said act, is directed to proceed in conformity with State laws relating to the control, appropriation, use, and distribution of water used in irrigation, subject to any vested right acquired thereunder, but the Secretary of the Army and other Federal officers and agencies having to do with water-resources development are not so limited; and

Whereas the authority to regulate and control the distribution of the waters of streams arising in States lying wholly or partly west of the ninety-eighth meridian is properly the exclusive sovereign function of the States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That, reaffirming its position taken in its Resolutions No. 12 adopted in 1946, No. 8 adopted in 1947, and No. 10 adopted in 1949, said association urges the enactment of legislation by the Congress directing the Secretary of the Army and all other Federal officers and agencies having to do with water-resources development projects, to proceed in conformity with State water laws and subject to rights vested thereunder, in like manner as the Secretary of the Interior is now directed by said section 8 of the Reclamation Act of 1902.

Resolution No. 9

COURT PROCEEDINGS

Whereas this association has heretofore urged—

1. That the integrity of the water laws of the Western States should be preserved and that the basic provisions of section 8 of the Reclamation Act of 1902 should be reaffirmed.

2. That legislation be urged to strengthen the basic concept of section 8 to require that the administration and distribution of such appropriated waters shall at all times be under the control, direction, and supervision of the established water officials and courts of the State which would be vested with jurisdiction if the appropriation had been made by a nongovernmental agency.

3. That the Board of Directors consider the advisability of seeking legislation from the Congress of the United States granting to the Secretary of the Interior for and on behalf of the United States of America the consent and authority of the United States to adjudicate the amounts and priorities of water rights in which the United States has an interest and authorizing and consenting that the Secretary on behalf of the United States may sue or be sued in all suits necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States in water appropriation matters in the State courts of the State where such waters are appropriated and/or beneficially used and under and pursuant to the applicable water laws of such State.

Whereas since the formulation of said policy, the United States Department of Justice, as the legal representative of the United States Bureau of Reclamation, has chosen the courts of the United States, and disavowed the courts of the States, as the forum for the adjudication of water rights: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the officers, employees, and committees of this association be and they are hereby directed to seek the passage of a law of the United States consenting to court proceedings by or against the United States in the courts of the various States in connection with the adjudication and determination of water rights, in language so clear and unmistakable that there can be no misunderstanding as to its meaning, and finding that such language is not amendatory of but only definitive of existing law.

BROADENING SECTION 1, 1944 FLOOD CONTROL ACT

Whereas by sections 1 (a) and 1 (c) of the 1944 Flood Control Act certain procedure is prescribed for the submission by the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Interior of their project reports to each other and to the Governors of the affected States for comment; and

Whereas the underlying purposes of such submission of reports are not confined to reports of the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Interior: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association does hereby urge that the provisions of sections 1 (a) and 1 (c) of the said act be so broadened as to make like reporting procedure required of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Federal Power Commission and other Federal agencies having to do with water and power development projects.

BROADENING SECTION 1 (B), 1944 FLOOD CONTROL ACT

Whereas, section 1 (b) of the 1944 Flood Control Act subordinates the use of water for navigation in the West, in connection with works authorized by that act, to beneficial consumptive uses such as domestic and irrigation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the National Reclamation Association that said section should be so broadened in connection with all works authorized for construction by the United States as to subordinate the use of water for power, as well as navigation, to consumptive uses in the West, and also to make the section apply to all works for navigation and power, as well as only works authorized for construction by said 1944 act.

FEDERAL WATER DEVELOPMENT ORGANIZATIONS

Whereas in the report of the Hoover Commission recommendations are made for the incorporation of the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers into the Department of the Interior: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That said association believes it to be in the national interest that the water-development functions of the Federal Government remain in the hands of the existing agencies which now have such functions and opposes the incorporation of the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers into the Department of the Interior.

Resolution No. 13

NONREIMBURSABLES FOR NONFEDERAL PROJECTS

Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Army Engineers are by law authorized to expend funds as appropriated by Congress in the construction of reclamation and flood-control projects, including certain nonreimbursable costs; and

Whereas publicly owned projects proposed under State laws and financed with funds other than those appropriated to the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Army Engineers are unable to finance the cost of such nonreimbursable items above-mentioned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association favors congressional authorization for the expenditure by the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Army Engineers of funds for such nonreimbursable costs on such projects; be it further

Resolved, That the proper officials of this association are hereby directed to cause the necessary legislation to be introduced in Congress to authorize such expenditures.

Resolution No. 14

AUTHORIZING PREPARATION OF SMALL-PROJECTS LEGISLATION

Whereas the small-projects committee of the association has submitted its report, dated November 8, 1950; and

Whereas the association approves in principle the recommendations made in that report: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the small-projects committee be continued and collaborate with the legislative committee in the preparation and support of suitable Federal and State legislation to effectuate the recommendations of the small-projects committee.

Resolution No. 15

OWNERSHIP OF SMALL POWER GENERATING PLANTS

Whereas it has been the practice of the Bureau of Reclamation, in negotiating the terms of repayment contracts or amended repayment contracts on Federal irrigation projects, to retain ownership of any small power plant which may be incidental to an irrigation project, and in instances where said plant is primarily designed to furnish power for pumping of irrigation water to the lands of said project; and

Whereas it may be the desire of landowners on the project to repay the construction cost of said power generating plant in the same manner as the cost of the diversion dams and irrigation canals are repaid: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That where small power generating plants are determined to be feasible of construction as an adjunct of an irrigation project and where the principal purpose of said plant is the generating of power for the pumping of irrigation water to the lands of that project and where all or the major part of the output of said plant is consumed in the process of said pumping, then and in that event, the water users of the project shall have the option of taking possession of said plant, and the operation thereof, under the same terms and conditions as are extended with respect to the canal and other irrigation works on that project.

Resolution No. 16

CODIFICATION OF RECLAMATION LAWS

Whereas the National Reclamation Association, through the adoption of its Resolution No. 5, adopted in 1948, initiated a movement for the codification of the reclamation laws; and

Whereas the House Judiciary Committee Subcommittee on Codification of Laws has undertaken to provide for the codification of the reclamation laws, and the work of preparing a draft code is now in progress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association does hereby express its hearty appreciation of the action taken by the House Judiciary Committee and by the Secretary of the Interior in support of such action, and does hereby offer to said Judiciary Committee at the appropriate time to suggest competent persons to serve on an advisory committee for the purpose of examining and criticizing such draft code.

Resolution No. 17

AMEND FEDERAL POWER ACT WITH RESPECT TO STATE DAMS

Whereas under the existing Federal Power Act (41 Stat. 1063), before a State or State agency can build a power dam on a navigable stream, it is required to obtain a license from the Federal Power Commission in which the United States reserves the right to take the dam and power plant after 50 years at their depreciated value; and

Whereas such provisions are inequitable to States and their agencies: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That, reaffirming its Resolution No. 13, adopted in 1949, the National Reclamation Association urges the Congress to amend the Federal Power Act as follows:

1. So that neither a State, State agency, nor any public entity created under State law shall be required to file with the Commission a declaration of intention to construct a power dam across a navigable stream unless the Department of Defense shall have first determined that such dam will materially and adversely affect the navigability of the stream; and

2. So that whenever a State or its agency, or any public entity created under State law, may be required to file such declaration of intention and an application for a license, such license when issued shall contain no provision for recapture by the United States of such publicly owned project.

Whereas the National Reclamation Association is dedicated to encouraging the development, conservation, and utilization of the water resources of the 17 Western States under sound policies in the interests of the country as a whole; and

Whereas the National Reclamation Association, while recognizing that the Federal Government has important responsibilities in the prosecution of programs for the development, conservation, and utilization of water resources in the 17 Western States, believes that those States likewise have important responsibilities in the same field: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association:

1. That the National Reclamation Association urges upon the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government and hereby pledges its wholehearted support for the vigorous prosecution of a well-balanced program for the development, conservation, and utilization of water resources in and throughout the 17 Western States, including the construction of projects now under way and the authorization, adequate appropriations for, and the construction of projects for the improvement of navigation, the control of floods, river regulation, and the development, storage, conservation, and use of waters for all beneficial purposes, including particularly the fulfillment of domestic, agricultural, and industrial needs, the development of hydroelectric power, the improvement and protection of national parks, monuments, and recreational areas, and the protection and improvement of conditions favorable to fish and wildlife to a reasonable and practicable extent consistent with the essential needs of water conservation and development, all to the end of enriching the country as a whole, by providing domestic water, food and fiber for an expanding population, and by augmenting the source of electric energy and water for farms, municipalities, and industries, thus making this country strong in peace and in war.

2. That the National Reclamation Association urges upon the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government and hereby pledges its wholehearted support for such legislation as, consistent with the acquisition and preservation of rights in water under State law and with the preservation of the integrity of the laws of the 17 Western States in this field, will tend to relieve water and power users of the financial burden of costs properly allocable to broad national purposes served by Federal reclamation projects; to assure continued financial assistance from power revenues where applicable in the return of irrigation costs that are beyond the reasonable ability of the irrigation water users to return within a reasonable period of years; to clarify and to improve the terms of repayment and other contracts for the return of irrigation costs by water users; and to provide, to the fullest practicable extent consistent with serving and protecting the broad national purposes thereby served, for the local administration and operation of Federal reclamation projects, and features thereof.

GERLACH CASES

Whereas controversy long existed regarding the integrity and enforcibility of State laws and water rights created and existing thereunder, on the one hand, and the attempted application of national laws at variance therewith, on the other; and

Whereas in the case of United States v. Gerlach Livestock Co. and five associated cases, the Department of Justice urged and insisted before the Supreme Court of the United States that there are no vested private rights to the use of irrigation waters of western navigable rivers, but the Supreme Court, held squarely and conclusively that such vested private rights do exist; and

Whereas by section 8, Reclamation Act, 1902, the Secretary of the Interior is carrying out the provisions of said act, is directed to proceed in conformity with State laws relating to the control, appropriation, use and distribution of water used in irrigation, subject to any vested rights acquired thereunder: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That said Association does vigorously condemn the efforts of the Department of Justice to destroy State rights in western navigable streams; and be it further

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association reaffirms its position that State laws and water rights created and existing thereunder, should be respected, and that the Bureau of Reclamation, in carrying out the provisions of the reclamation laws, should, in pursuance of section 8 of the Reclamation Act of 1902, recognize and respect such vested rights created and existing under State laws.

Resolution No. 20

SELF-DETERMINATION ON INTEGRATION OF PROJECTS

Whereas in some instances the Bureau of Reclamation has proposed to integrate one project into another for the purpose of aiding the feasibility of the latter project by adding to it the so-called excess repayment ability of the former project, and such integration is opposed by the people of the former project: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That such integration should be made only when it is freely and voluntarily approved by the decision of the project to be integrated.

Resolution No. 21

SUPPLEMENTAL WATER PROJECTS

Whereas in many localities throughout the West farming areas which have been established for generations are facing curtailment of their future operations by reason of deficient or failing water supplies; and

Whereas in such communities hundreds of millions of dollars of investment are in jeopardy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That adequate consideration should be given in the preparation of investigations and reports to projects to furnish supplemental water supplies to areas now suffering from insufficient water supplies.

Resolution No. 22

INTERSTATE COMPACTS

Whereas there have been statements on various occasions by high Government officials indicating the possibility of diversion of waters from the watercourses or watersheds of one State to other watersheds in another State; and

Whereas it is conceivable that such diversion might interfere with the logical development of the individual States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association recommends that such situations be adjusted by compacts between the States involved.

Resolution No. 23

SUGAR ACT

Whereas a balanced agricultural economy of irrigation farming often includes the production of sugar beets; and

Whereas the present sugar law, which restricts production of sugar in continental United States expires December 31, 1952: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association urges the renewal of the Sugar Act with revisions to increase the domestic sugar-beet production with special relation to reclamation development.

Resolution No. 24

TITLE TO SUBMERGED LANDS

Whereas in the cases of U. S. v. California, U. S. v. Louisiana, and U. S. v. Texas, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the States do not own lands submerged under the marginal sea belt within their boundaries, nor the resources therein, and has based its decision on the need of the United States to exercise its powers under the Constitution to handle international affairs and national defense; and

Whereas the United States, under the decisions in said case, may raise claim to the beds of navigable inland streams which are owned by the States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That reaffirming its resolution No. 14 adopted in 1947, its resolution No. 8 adopted in 1948, and its resolution No. 16 adopted in 1949, said association urges that the Congress promptly adopt legislation recognizing or vesting in the several States the absolute title to the submerged lands within their respective boundaries, as established when annexed or admitted to the Union, subject only to the paramount rights granted the United States by the Constitution to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and intercourse with other nations, but expressly excluding any claim of the United States to any proprietary rights in any such lands or resources except upon payment of just compensation and under due process of law.

Resolution No. 25

COOPERATION WITH LAND-GRANT COLLEGES

The National Reclamation Association reaffirms the position taken in Resolution No. 14 of the 1949 convention with respect to cooperation in the planning and construction of reclamation projects with the Bureau of Reclamation by the western land-grant colleges and the universities and the agencies of the Department of Agriculture. The progress made in the last year as reported by the Secretary of the Interior to the Committee on Irrigated Agriculture and Water Resources in the form of 17 new memorandum of agreements with the colleges, including 1 with the Department of Agriculture is gratifying but it is urged that the western land-grant colleges take greater leadership, as recommended by said committee at the focal points of coordination of the reclamation program in their respective States in order that the full technical skills of Federal agencies and land-grant institutions may be brought to bear on this program.

Resolution No. 26

SMALL AREAS FOR RECREATION

Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation is cooperating with the National Park Service in order to make available recreation areas along the shores of reclamation reservoirs throughout the 17 Western States; and

Whereas under existing Federal law the Bureau of Reclamation lacks the necessary authority to acquire additional small areas of land lying continguous to reservoir areas for recreation purposes except upon reimbursement by the water users; and

Whereas under existing Federal law the Bureau of Reclamation lacks the necessary authority to transfer federally developed recreation areas to States, or subdivisions of the States, wherein the reservoir and recreation area is located: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association endorse the passage of the necessary laws to carry out the intent and purposes of the foregoing preamble: Be it further

Resolved, That the proper officials of this association are hereby directed to cause the necessary legislation to be introduced in Congress to carry out the intent and purposes of the foregoing preamble, such legislation to be subject to the consent of the governor of the affected State and the governing board of the affected county.

Resolution No. 27

FARM CREDIT

Whereas the Farmers Home Administration has the authority to make loans to settlers on reclamation projects who cannot obtain such credit from any other source; and

Whereas funds available for distribution by the Farmers Home Administration are entirely inadequate to meet the pressing needs of families selected for settlement on these projects; and

Whereas the National Reclamation Association has adopted a resolution for the last 2 years urging the Congress of the United States to appropriate and allot funds; and

Whereas the appropriation bill for 1950 appropriated and specifically allotted a certain amount of money for development loans through Farmers Home Administration for reclamation projects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That sufficient funds be appropriated and specifically allotted to provide loan funds for the purpose of land development and building construction as well as operating costs and purchase of livestock and machinery.

Resolution No. 28

STUDY OF PERCENTAGE CONTRACTS

Whereas an orderly and workable plan for repayment of construction costs of reclamation projects is necessary to protect Federal investment and at the same time enable irrigators to discharge their obligations for such construction; and

Whereas present laws do not permit the Bureau of Reclamation to enter into repayment contracts providing for the application of the proceeds of a fixed percentage of each year's crops; and

Whereas it appears that in some instances, both in original contractual negotiations and in renegotiation of existing contracts, that it would be in the best interests of all parties concerned that such provisions of repayment be permitted; and

Whereas former laws respecting repayment provisions embodying these principles have not met the needs which prompt the needs for such provisions, and it appears that study should be had to determine the advisability of making such provisions available where advisable: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That the president of this association be, and hereby is, directed to refer to a committee the matter of the study of the advisability of repayment contracts embodying the principles of the proceeds of a percentage of the crop being applied upon the contract each year, to recommend the policy of this association with respect thereto, and such other matters as appear to need study in connection therewith, and report to this association at its 1951 convention.

Resolution No. 29

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Whereas the United States of America and Dominion of Canada have and cherish continued friendly international relations; and

Whereas the economic and political problems of both nations are closely interwoven and mutually dependent; and

Whereas there has been created by the treaty of 1909, an International Joint Commission for the purpose of resolving boundary water disputes which may arise between the two nations; and

Whereas there are many international streams and streams which flow across the boundary between the two nations, and the development and use of these water resources are to the mutual advantage of the two countries; and

Whereas it would be to the serious disadvantage of both nations to allow any dispute over the use of such waters to affect adversely or otherwise impair the friendly relations heretofore existing between the United States and Dominion of Canada; and

Whereas such occurence would not only deter developments in the immediate States or Provinces in which proposed projects might be located, but would also adversely affect the negotiation of other such matters in other States or Provinces all across the international boundary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That the International Joint Commission continue the splendid work it is now accomplishing on the many important matters now before it, and in the interest of promoting continuing cordial relations between the States, the Provinces, and the nations and that it be encouraged to expedite its recommendation to the two Governments looking toward an equitable apportionment of the flows of international streams between the two countries for the mutual benefit of the citizens of the United States and Dominion of Canada.

Resolution No. 30

MULTIPLE-PURPOSE DEVELOPMENT

Whereas the comprehensive, multiple-purpose development of our major river basins logically falls into four phases—planning, financing, construction, and operation; and

Whereas development of such comprehensive programs, necessary to serve the public interest by enhancing the well-being of the people through development and conservation of all land and water resources, results in innumerable problems; and

Whereas adequate consideration of all resource potentials has not always been given in the planning phase of multiple-purpose projects: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association endorse the principle of multiple-purpose development but urge that they be planned and put into effect by joint and coordinated action of existing and interested Federal and State agencies of government and in accordance with interstate compacts where appropriate, and a prompt and practical time schedule and in such a way as to insure:

1. Adequate consideration of all resource potentials in each basin such as irrigation, drainage, power, flood control, fish and wildlife, recreation, navigation, soil conservation, watershed protection, and other related purposes as they contribute to the development of industry, agriculture, forestry; and

2. The proper participation of all local, State, and Federal interests in the planning and consummation of such developments; and

3. Compliance with section 1, Flood Control Act, 1944.

Resolution No. 31

CONSERVATION PRACTICES

Whereas the National Reclamation Association recognizes that the further development of irrigation agriculture is an integral part of the Nation's program of conservation, utilization, and improvement of its soil and water resources to meet the increasing demands of a growing population; and

Whereas the wise use and development of the watershed lands is essential to a continuing supply of irrigation water; and

Whereas conservation practices on all other lands lying above irrigation reservoirs will reduce the amount of silt deposited in such reservoirs, thereby prolonging their period of usefulness; and

Whereas the effectiveness of comprehensive programs of watershed development of irrigation, flood control, navigation, and allied purposes depends on all lands being so managed as to reduce erosion, floods, and reservoir siltation, and guarantee the continued productive uses of such lands; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association affirms its previous position:

1. As favoring the enactment of a policy recognizing the constructive and productive multiple-use of all the resources of the West.

2. Of urging the practice of all activities that aid in establishing conservation farming on the farms and ranches lying above all reservoirs, where such practices do not adversely affect the existing irrigation water supply.

Resolution No. 32

INTANGIBLE BENEFITS

Whereas the continuing development of our water resources for domestic, navigation, flood control, irrigation, recreation, and other possible benefits are of prime importance; and

Whereas we realize that water is a vital natural resource, essential to our expanding economy, and we believe that every measure should be employed to safeguard the supply and promote the beneficial use of water. We also know that the public at large receives many remote and intangible benefits from water conservation projects, such as the storage of water for future use, recreation, pollution abatement, and kindred uses and that none of said uses can readily be evaluated in monetary terms, but that the results of said uses are all essential to our economic well-being;

It is, therefore, the sense of this association that the Congress establish a formula for use by the Federal agencies which will operate to give an economic valuation basis to all such potential beneficial uses and that credit therefore be included in computing the economic cost benefit ratio in all projects involving water conservation.

Resolution No. 33

ADEQUATE APPROPRIATIONS FOR WATER DEVELOPMENT

Whereas the primary objective of the National Reclamation Association is the complete development of the land and water resources of the West; and

Whereas the accomplishment of these objectives calls for adequate appropriations by the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association hereby directs its officers to support before the Congress requests for sufficient appropriations to:

A. Permit the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Engineers to continue progressive construction programs in consonance with the needs therefor;

B. Support acceleration of the Forest Service program of revegetation, range improvements, and physical improvement of national forests;

C. Support and continue the snow survey service of the Department of Agriculture;

D. Permit prompt and continuing acquisition by the Geological Survey of basic data respecting both stream flow and ground-water resources throughout the Nation, and full support by the various States of this program is urged;

E. Permit completion of standard topographic mapping of the United States, if possible, within 20 years;

F. Support research, investigation, and action programs in soil and water conservation, basic and essential to the sound development and full continued care of the Nation's land and water resources, basin-wide and in harmony with multiple-use projects development.

Resolution No. 34

CODIFICATION OF RESOLUTIONS

Whereas throughout the history of the National Reclamation Association it has established its policies by resolutions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of directors is requested to designate a committee for the purpose of codifying the resolutions which constitute the present policy of the National Reclamation Association.

Resolution No. 35

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Be it resolved, That the president of the association shall appoint a committee of not less than five members to formulate and recommend to the board of directors legislation relating to the objectives of this association, and, when directed by the board of directors, to take specific action in regard to legislation: Further

Resolved, That the officers of the association shall, and the Bureau of Reclamation is requested to, cooperate with the committee by keeping it advised as to the development of legislative measures affecting reclamation, and the committee shall make appropriate recommendations to the board of directors relative thereto.

Resolution No. 36

RECLAMATION LEGISLATION

Be it resolved, That the board of directors direct the legislative committee to proceed in the Eighty-second Congress with respect to reclamation legislation in such manner as in the judgment of the board of directors may be practicable at the time.

Resolution No. 37

IMPLEMENTATION OF RESOLUTIONS

Resolved, That the secretary-manager of the National Reclamation Association is directed to call the resolutions adopted at this meeting to the attention of the appropriate Federal officers and agencies and to the Members of the Congress and the governors and attorneys general of the 17 Western States and all others concerned therewith, and that the officers and staff of the association carry out the policies declared in said resolutions.

Resolution No. 38

APPRECIATION

Whereas the arrangements made by, the services given, and the entertainment provided by the citizens of Spokane as represented by the city officials, the chamber of commerce, and many other organizations, hotels, and individuals have contributed much to the success of the nineteenth annual meeting of the National Reclamation Assocation on November 15, 16, and 17, 1950: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the association does hereby extend its thanks and appreciation to all the members of the convention committees, to the press and the radio stations, to the hotels and auto courts of Spokane and environs, to those who have participated in the program of the meetings and to those who have provided entertainment and to all others who have contributed to an outstanding meeting.

Resolution No. 39

ASSOCIATION OFFICERS

Whereas in the interest of good association practice it is believed that there should be a limitation on the tenure of office for elective officers of any association: Be it therefore

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association, That its president be requested to appoint a committee of five for the purpose of drafting recommendations with respect to the tenure of office and also the eligibility to office of the president, first vice president, and second vice president, of the National Reclamation Association, that such report be so submitted to the board of directors so that any suggested amendment to the constitution may be acted upon and be effective at the 1951 annual meeting of the association.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FREAR:

S. 483. A bill authorizing the construction of a highway bridge across the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal at Summit, Del.; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska:

S. 484. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Dorothy Manious; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 485. A bill to provide a decree of competency for United States Indians in certain cases; and

S. 486. A bill to provide for medical services to non-Indians in Indian hospitals, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(Mr. BRICKER introduced Senate bill 487, to establish a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. NEELY (by request):

S. 488. A bill to increase the fee of jurors in condemnation proceedings instituted by the District of Columbia;

S. 489. A bill to provide compensation for duty voluntarily performed on their days off by officers and members of the Metropolitan Police force, the United States Park Police force, and the White House Police force;

S. 490. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of podiatry in the District of Columbia";

S. 491. A bill to amend the Boiler Inspection Act of the District of Columbia;

S. 492. A bill to provide that children be committed to the Board of Public Welfare in lieu of being committed to the National Training School for Girls; that the property and personnel of the National Training School for Girls be available for the care of children committed to or accepted by the Board of Public Welfare; and for other purposes;

S. 493. A bill to require the taking and destruction of dangerous weapons in certain cases, and for other purposes; and

S. 494. A bill to provide for the appointment of a deputy disbursing officer and assistant disbursing officers for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DWORSHAK:

S. 495. A bill for the relief of Richard J. Walling; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JENNER:

S. 496. A bill for the relief of Dennis Ralph Selvon; and

S. 497. A bill for the relief of Lawrence Horst Luellen (formerly Horst Kluge); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HILL:

S. 498. A bill to provide hospital care for certain veterans residing in the Republic of the Philippines; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

TEMPORARY NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill together with a statement prepared concerning the bill by me be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 487) to establish a temporary National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, introduced by Mr. BRICKER, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

SEC. 1. (a) There is hereby established a temporary national bipartisan commission, in which the various levels of Government are represented, to be known as the National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"), which shall be composed of 14 members as follows:

(1) Four appointed by the President of the United States, two of whom shall be officers of the executive branch of the Government, and two private citizens, all of whom shall have had experience with or knowledge of the major problems in the field of intergovernmental relations;

(2) Two appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be Members of the Senate;

(3) Two appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall be Members of the House;

(4) Three appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be State officials, from a panel of at least nine, submitted by the Council of State Governments;

(5) Two appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be municipal officials, from a panel of at least six, submitted jointly by the American Municipal Association, the International City Managers Association, and the United States Conference of Mayors; and

(6) One appointed by the President of the United States, who shall be a county official, from a panel of at least three, submitted by the National Association of County Officials.

(b) Of the members enumerated in paragraph (1) of subsection (a), not more than two members shall be from any one political party; of each class of members enumerated in paragraphs (2), (3), and (5), not more than one member shall be from any one political party; and of the four members enumerated in paragraphs (4) and (6), not more than two members shall be from any one political party.

(c) Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(d) The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

(e) A quorum of the Commission shall consist of eight members, except that for the purpose of taking sworn testimony a quorum shall consist of one member.

DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 2. (a) It shall be the duty of the Commission to submit to the Congress specific recommendations based upon a study of—

(1) (A) the past and present relations between the National, State, and local governments of the United States; (B) the past and present allocation of governmental functions and powers among the National, State, and local governments of the United States; (C) governmental functions and powers exercised by two or more such governments, the distribution of jurisdiction over such functions exercised by each such government;

(2) the fiscal relations among the National, State, and local governments with a view of determining the possibilities, and mechanism for achieving, on a continuous basis, consistency in the fiscal policies of the several levels of governments. In making such study the Commission shall give particular attention to (A) intergovernmental tax immunities in terms of the problems they create for governments and taxpayers, and means for resolving these problems; (B) revenue sources and means for reducing or eliminating intergovernmental tax competition; and (C) grants-in-aid, tax sharing, and other similar measures for adjusting financial resources to the needs of State and local governments, with a view to proposing guides to the use of such devices and improvements in their operation.

(b) The Commission shall submit a final report of its activities, and the results of its studies to the Congress on or before the end of the second fiscal year which commences after the date of enactment of this act, and shall cease to exist upon the submission of such final report.

POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission may, in carrying out this act, hold such hearings, take such testimony, and sit and act at such times and places as the Commission deems advisable. Any member of the Commission may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission. The Commission may delegate the powers conferred by this subsection to any member or to a group of members of the Commission.

(b) The Commission is authorized to secure from any department, agency, or independent instrumentality of the executive branch of the Government any information it deems necessary to carry out its functions under this act; and each such department, agency, and instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman or Vice Chairman.

(c) The Commission shall have the power, without regard to the civil-service laws, to appoint and fix the compensation of an executive secretary, who shall be the chief administrative officer of the Commission, and such other personnel as it deems advisable, but the rates of compensation of such personnel shall not exceed the rates prescribed in the Classification Act of 1949 for comparable duties.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. (a) Any member or members of the Commission who are appointed from among Members of Congress or from the executive branch of the Government shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of Congress or in the executive branch, but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission.

(b) Members of the Commission, other than those to whom subsection (a) is applicable, shall receive compensation at the rate of $50 per day for each day they are engaged in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission and shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 5. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The statement presented by Mr. BRICKER is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BRICKER

On February 3, 1949, I introduced, on behalf of the then junior Senator from Maryland, Mr. O'CONOR, and myself, S. 767, a bill to establish an intergovernmental commission to make a study of our Federal system and to recommend to the Congress of the United States appropriate allocation and distribution of duties and powers among the local, State, and national levels of government. The bill grew out of the experiences of State and local officials across the Nation who found the expansion of the Federal Government invading those fields of police, welfare, and tax powers which had historically been reserved to State and local governments.

The careful men who drafted the Constitution of the United States recognized perhaps better than most of us, the perils of a strong central government. They cautiously delineated the powers to be granted to the National Government, reserving the rest to the States and to the people. The past half century, and particularly the past 20 years, have seen a continual assault on the historic separation of powers specified by the Constitution. The growth of the National Government and the corresponding diminution of the powers of State and local governments have been continuing apace.

This phenomenon cannot be attributed to any single source. The bureaucrats of a national government have made grabs for power, and all too frequently a so-called liberal judiciary has sustained them. On the other hand, the local and State governments, in some instances, have been unwilling or financially unable to provide services demanded of them by one group or another, and these groups have turned to the Central Government. Whatever the cause or causes, the fact remains that the National Government has centralized and taken to itself many of the functions and powers which had been regarded as exclusively allocated by the Constitution to the several States.

I am one who believes in the Federal system of government as providing our strongest bulwark against state socialism and the best possible guaranty of individual liberty. It may be that the sovereign state is becoming obsolete, and that State and local governments must inevitably degenerate into administrative units of an all-powerful central government. Certainly, if the present trend continues, that is the unavoidable result. I do not believe the trend is irreversible, and I, for one, do not intend to permit it to continue if I can help stop it.

It is probable that there are those who would welcome the destruction of State and local governments and call it progress. Certainly, should State governments retain their traditional powers, no national socialism could succeed. I doubt that the advocates of overpowering central government represent a majority of the people of the Nation. Regardless of the number and of the arguments, this change in form of government which we are undergoing should not be the product of State abdication, executive usurpation or judicial misinterpretation. This is a proper subject for open debate in the political arena.

Therefore, I am today reintroducing, in somewhat modified form, the bill to which I have earlier referred. This bill provides for a thorough study of the entire question, from which should emerge an intelligent chart for our future course. If our Federal system is to be altered, the alteration should be the result of deliberate choice, after free debate and with full knowledge of the consequences.

It will be noted that I have retained the so-called panel system of selection of members for the Commission. It was this point which forestalled the passage of legislation during the Eighty-first Congress. In my judgment, if the Commission is to be of help to the Congress, it must be entirely above partisan suspicion and truly representative of the various levels of government. The only real guaranty of these two criteria, as I see it, is to insure that organized officials of the various levels of government be given advisory roles in the selection of Commission members.

The executive branch of the Government, as I understand it, objected during the Eighty-first Congress to a panel form of selection on the ground that it unduly restricted the President. In my judgment, that is the only guarantee of a properly representative commission. With that view in mind, on February 14 of last year, I wrote each of the Governors of the United States, asking for advice and support. Most of them responded. Most of those who replied agreed with the panel form of selection. Two disagreed, and others, although strongly in favor of the establishment of such a commission, were not indicative of any particular disposition on the matter of selection of commission members.

If I may quote from a few of the letters, I may be able to illustrate the interest of State executives across the Nation in this problem. The Governor of New York, the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey, stated, in part:

"I think your bill is sound and exceedingly constructive. I agree with your position."

The Honorable Frederick G. Payne, Governor of the State of Maine:

"I concur wholeheartedly with you in this matter, and believe that the points you have set forth in your letter are sound and practical. * * *

"The panel form of selection as outlined in the original bill whereby the Council of State Governments, the municipal officials, the National Association of County Officers should be represented, to me is most important. After all, these are the groups who are vitally concerned with this problem and know more about what is needed than any other groups."

The Honorable J. Strom Thurmond, Governor of the State of South Carolina:

"Should this diversity of viewpoint be sacrificed, the very purpose of such a Commission would be jeopardized."

The Honorable J. Bracken Lee, Governor of the State of Utah:

"There is no question as to the fairness of your position with which I am in wholehearted support."

Similar letters were received from other governors, both Republican and Democratic, from Oregon to Georgia.

Finally, I should point out that this measure implements the recommendations of the Commission on Reorganization of the Executive Branch, under the chairmanship of the distinguished ex-President of the United States, Herbert Hoover. The recommendation of the Commission was stated as follows:

"We recommend that the functions and activities of government be appraised to determine which can be most advantageously operated by the various levels of government, and which require joint policy making, financing, and administration."

And, further, that an "agency on Federal-State relations be created with primary responsibility for study, information, and guidance in the field of Federal-State relations."

INCORPORATION OF THE MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today S. 3599 of the Eighty-first Congress, for the purpose of incorporation of the Military Order of the Purple Heart.

I know that my colleagues are familiar with the outstanding record of this splendid organization which has served so well the men who bear on their bodies the greatest badge of patriotism of all—scars inflicted in the service of their country.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which explains very clearly the work of this fine veterans' group and that there be recorded thereafter a list of the officers of the military order's department in Wisconsin and of the officers of its auxiliary.

The letter is a Christmas message sent by the department commander, Richard P. Golick, to families of the Korean wounded, as printed in the December 1950 issue of the magazine, the Wisconsin Purple Hearter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the letter, together with the list of officers will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The bill (S. 499) to incorporate the Military Order of the Purple Heart, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The letter and list of officers are as follows:

THE WISCONSIN PURPLE HEARTER,
DEPARTMENT OF WISCONSIN,
MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART,
Christmas 1950.

To the Families of the Korean Wounded:

In recent casualty lists issued by the Department of Defense, the name of your loved one was included as having been wounded in action against the enemies of our beloved country and other freedom-loving peoples.

The Department of Wisconsin, Military Order of the Purple Heart, and its Ladies' Auxiliary wish to extend their sincere sympathy and render this tribute to him and to you for the great sacrifice that has been made on behalf of liberty and freedom in the world. We hope and pray for his speedy recovery and safe return home when his duty has been fulfilled.

In recognition of this highest of all meritorious service—the suffering of wounds in combat—he will receive, or has already received, the Purple Heart decoration, originated by Gen. George Washington himself, in the year 1782. It will interest you to know that it is the only award servicemen win themselves, without any recommendation of superior officers.

All those receiving the Purple Heart Medal automatically become members of the Military Order of the Purple Heart. There are presently close to a million living wounded veterans of all wars who have been awarded the Purple Heart. Their feminine blood relatives (mother, daughter, sister, grandmother, and wife) are all eligible for membership in the Ladies' Auxiliary.

Both organizations exist and function to render service to living holders of the Purple Heart and their families, and the dependents of those who were killed in action or die subsequently. The chapters and units throughout the State of Wisconsin are therefore at your service.

We have mailed this Christmas issue of the Wisconsin Purple Hearter to you, with the thought in mind that you would be interested in knowing of our organization which is ready to assist you with any problems with which you may be confronted. If you feel your son or husband or brother would like to receive our magazine, simply send us his APO address.

We extend to you a most cordial invitation to meet with any of us who are bound together through our mutual interests and common experiences.

Very sincerely yours,
RICHARD P. GOLICK,
Department Commander.

ISSUANCE OF STAMP IN COMMEMORATION OF LIFE OF EMILY P. BISSELL

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, 2 years ago, I introduced in the Senate a joint resolution to authorize the issuance of a stamp in commemoration of the life of Emily P. Bissell. As many Americans undoubtedly know, Emily Bissell founded and promoted the sale of the famed Christmas seal which has since become probably the greatest single factor in the fight against tuberculosis. It is extremely regrettable to me that the Eighty-first Congress did not see fit to act favorably on that joint resolution. Certainly, in times such as these, when we are devoting many billions of dollars for the economic and military security of nations throughout the world, it is little enough to ask that we approve a simple undertaking such as this one, whose effects will redound to sufferers of tuberculosis all over this great Nation.

The issuance of a commemorative stamp would serve to focus additional public attention on the Christmas seal, and would unquestionably increase its sale. That is the primary purpose I have in reintroducing this joint resolution, and I earnestly solicit the support of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in securing its passage. Its approval would be a boon to the National Tuberculosis Society and to the various State chapters of this organization which each year devote their time and efforts in the cause of eradicating this disease. No large expenditure of Federal funds is involved. The joint resolution affords an opportunity for Congress to enlist its services in the struggle to save human lives here at home.

Emily Bissell, who founded the seal in America back in 1907, led the crusade for that little stamp until her death in March of 1948. She was a gallant woman whose enthusiasm and humanitarian work against tuberculosis resulted in a great victory over this dreaded disease. In this undertaking, she was generously aided by Americans who had faith in her proposal and who have supported her over the years.

Miss Bissell sought nothing for herself. Her objective was a healthier America, for she knew, as so many of us do, the terrible toll that tuberculosis has taken and is continuing to take in American lives. Her own State of Delaware considers Emily Bissell as one of its most distinguished late citizens; and I, therefore, consider it an honor to be able to introduce this joint resolution. Irrespective of the policy which the committees of Congress, in considering proposed legislation of this type, saw fit to adopt during the Eighty-first Congress, I want to urge, in the strongest possible terms, that this joint resolution be given the most careful attention, for I am certain that because of the one principal objective it seeks to attain, it should have the unqualified support of all of us. It will implement the fight against tuberculosis in a manner which is urgently needed.

I send to the desk for appropriate reference the joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution, together with a brief biographical sketch of Miss Emily P. Bissell, the founder of the Christmas seal, together with copies of letters which I have sent to the chairmen of the Senate and House Post Office and Civil Service Committees in behalf of this joint resolution, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the joint resolution, together with the biographical sketch and letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) to authorize the issuance of a stamp in commemoration of the life of Emily P. Bissell, introduced by Mr. FREAR, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to issue a special series of 3-cent postage stamps, of such design as he shall prescribe, in commemoration of the life of Emily P. Bissell and of her service to mankind through the founding and promotion of the Christmas seal, the sale of which has been a vital factor in the battle against tuberculosis.

The biographical sketch and letters presented by Mr. FREAR are as follows:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Miss Emily P. Bissell was born in Wilmington, Del., May 31, 1861, and was a native of her State all of her life. Her grandfather, John Bissell, settled in Windsor, Conn. Her father, C. A. Bissell (1829–99), graduated from Yale in 1850. Her mother, Josephine Wales (1832–1919), was a daughter of John Wales who was born in New Haven, Conn., but later settled in Wilmington, Del. He was a United States Senator. Miss Bissell was educated in Delaware and New York. She attended Miss Charlier's private school in New York City.

Pioneer work always interested her. She started the West End Reading Room in 1889 and it had the first free kindergarten, the first children's playground in Delaware, the first better babies' demonstration, the first Boys' Brigade (forerunner of the Boy Scouts), and the first free gymnasium for boys. In 1917, it began the first Americanization work in Delaware in its Italian Neighborhood House.

Miss Bissell was instrumental in putting through the first child-labor law in Delaware, and served on the first child-labor commission. She was one of the organizers of the children's bureau, and served on its board until her death.

She was the first president of the Consumer's League and aided the passage of the first law limiting the hours of women in industry. At the request of the Hon. George Grey, she aided him in establishing the Delaware chapter of the American Red Cross in 1904 and was its secretary for many years.

She was a director of the associated charities for many years and was chairman of social service in the Federation of Women's Clubs for 8 years.

In connection with all these responsibilities came the raising of large amounts of money. The Christmas stamp of 1907 was not a momentary idea—it was the result of a great deal of practical experience in starting and carrying forward new experiments in Delaware applied to this government idea from Denmark. The Story of the American Christmas Seal, written by Miss Bissell herself, was published in booklet form in 1946 by the National Tuberculosis Association.

Miss Bissell's contribution to mankind has been acknowledged nationally and internationally. In December of 1936, she was honored in Wilmington, Del., at a Christmas seal birthday luncheon attended by 400 friends and health workers representing many sections of the country and several foreign countries. In December of 1937, the city of Wilmington, the State of Delaware, and two nations again paid honor to Miss Bissell when the Tuberculosis Associations of the United States unveiled a bronze tablet which was placed on the main building of the Brandywine Sanatorium, Marshallton, Del., with this legend: "This tablet commemorates the founding of the first Christmas seal in this country by Miss Emily P. Bissell, of Wilmington, Del., December 1907. From small beginnings, the annual Christmas seal sale has financed the development of the organized fight against tuberculosis in every State, resulting in saving thousands of lives. Erected by the Tuberculosis Associations of the United States, December 1937."

In 1942, Miss Bissell was awarded the Trudeau Medal of the National Tuberculosis Association, the first nonprofessional worker to receive this award since it was inaugurated in 1925. The award is given annually to the individual who, in the judgment of the association, has made the most meritorious contribution to the cause, prevention, or treatment of tuberculosis.

In 1946 Miss Bissell was honored by the Delaware State Board of Health when the main building at Brandywine Sanatorium was dedicated in her honor, hereafter to be known as the Emily P. Bissell Building. Miss Bissell is the author of many poems, which have been collected in a volume entitled "Happiness and Other Verses."

Miss Bissell was president of the Delaware Anti-Tuberculosis Society from 1909 until her death.

She was an honorary member of the National Tuberculosis Association and in 1946 was again honored when her portrait appeared on each sheet of Christmas seals. Miss Bissell passed away on March 8, 1948.

JANUARY 16, 1951.

Hon. OLIN D. JOHNSTON,
Chairman, Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR OLIN: I have just introduced in the Senate a joint resolution to authorize the issuance of a stamp in commemoration of the life of Emily P. Bissell, the founder and promoter of the famed Christmas seal, whose sale and use have done so much to eradicate tuberculosis. Approval of this resolution will, I am sure, do much toward increasing the purchase of Christmas seals by the American people and, therefore, materially aid the National Tuberculosis Society and its various chapters in their great task of combating this dreaded disease.

As a member of the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I am aware of the policy which existed in the past Congress of dealing with legislation requesting commemorative stamps. However, in this case, because the objective of this resolution is so far more profound than the mere honoring of a personality or an organization, I strongly feel that its approval should be effected.

I will be most appreciative of your personal interest and support of the resolution.

Sincerely yours.

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT RELATING TO LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. WHERRY submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 138. (a) There is hereby established a committee to prepare the legislative budget (hereinafter referred to as the 'committee'), to be composed of five members of the Senate Committee on Finance and five members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, to be appointed by the President of the Senate; and five members of the House Committee on Ways and Means and five members of the House Committee on Appropriations, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and not more than three members of each of said committees shall be members of the majority party. A vacancy in the committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection. At the beginning of each Congress the committee shall meet at the call of the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations and shall select its own chairman and vice chairman, except that the first meeting shall be called in , 195 . A majority of the committee shall constitute a quorum and the powers conferred upon them by this section may be exercised by a majority vote.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the committee to prepare and report to the Senate and to the House of Representatives at the beginning of each regular session of Congress a legislative budget for the ensuing fiscal year, including the estimated over-all Federal receipts and expenditures for such year. Such report shall be based upon the studies and investigations of the committee, giving due consideration to the budget recommendations of the President. Such report shall contain a recommendation for the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditures in such year which shall include such an amount to be reserved for deficiencies as may be deemed necessary by the committee. In addition to setting the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in such year, including a reserve for deficiencies, the committee may also recommend that public revenues or the public debt be increased or decreased, as the case may be; and such recommendations shall be reported to Congress and referred to its appropriate committees by February 15. All bills and joint resolutions authorizing appropriations reported from committees of the Senate or the House of Representatives shall be accompanied by reports in writing, which shall be printed; and there shall be included in each such report or in an accompanying document an estimate from the department or other agency of the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of the Government primarily concerned with the expenditure of any funds required to meet the probable cost of carrying out the legislation proposed in such bill or resolution over the first 5-year period of its operation or over the period of its operation if such legislation will be effective for less than 5 years. Estimates received from departments or agencies under this subsection may be submitted by the committees to the Bureau of the Budget for review, and such reviews shall, when practicable, be included within the accompanying documents before said bills and joint resolutions are reported. It shall be the responsibility of the committee to study such reports and report to the Congress as soon as possible thereafter the effect of that cost on the legislative budget.

"(c) The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and such clerical and other assistants and to fix their compensation without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. At least one-third of any staff so employed shall be nominated and appointed by, and assigned to assist the minority party.

"(d) The committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies of the Government.

"(e) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to pay the expenses of the committee, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate upon vouchers signed by the chairman."

REFERENCE TO COURT OF CLAIMS OF S. 334, FOR RELIEF OF OWNERS OF CERTAIN FINNISH SAILING VESSELS

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 34), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 334) entitled "A bill for the relief of the owners of certain Finnish sailing vessels," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims; and the court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28 of the United States Code and report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, giving such findings of fact and conclusions thereon as shall be sufficient to inform the Congress of the nature and character of the demand as claims, legal or equitable, against the United States and the amounts, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimants.

MR. TRUMAN AND THE CONSTITUTION—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Mr. Truman and the Constitution," written by Walter Lippmann and published in the Washington Post of today. It seems to me that in this article Mr. Lippmann makes a very distinct contribution to the discussion now taking place with respect to the authority of the President to send troops or armed forces anywhere in the world.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. TRUMAN AND THE CONSTITUTION

(By Walter Lippmann)

The argument about the President's right to send an army abroad is demonstrating once more that the great rule of the Constitution is common sense. The system of our Government is impossible if headstrong theorists take charge. The system is workable when the men who hold the offices mean to make it work by being themselves sensible and practical.

Thus one set of theorists is arguing that the President has the right to send armies abroad without the permission of Congress. Another set of theorists is arguing that Congress, which must pass laws to draft men and to appropriate money, has a right to say whether there shall be any armies for the President to send abroad. Each of these theories leads to an absurdity: the ultra-Presidential theory to a Commander in Chief who might not have any army to command; the ultra-congressional theory to an army which was not under the orders of the Commander in Chief.

These absurdities disappear under the rule of common sense. Since the President needs the continuing support of this Congress and its successors in order to maintain large forces, the sensible thing for him to do is to convince the Congress that his policies are sound and then to commit the Congress to them. This, as I understand it, is the position of Senator TAFT and also of Senator GEORGE and of Senator DOUGLAS. They recognize that this is a question of policy, not of legal right, and that the practical and sensible, the expedient and the wise, thing for the President to do is to invite the Congress to participate in the decision.

His unwillingness to do that is hard to understand. The decision to place large American armies on the European Continent, to place them within striking distance of the greatest of all existing armies, is to accept an enormous risk. Those of us who believe that it is a correctly calculated risk and that we should take it ought to feel that the whole Nation has understood and accepted the reasons for the decision, and that with its eyes open the Nation has agreed to share the responsibility.

Why Mr. Truman should want to take the whole responsibility on himself, why he should reject rather than invite, indeed insist upon, sharing his awful responsibility with Congress, I cannot imagine. Last June, the day after he intervened in Korea, Senator TAFT offered to support a resolution approving his action. Was it wise to ignore this offer from the leader of the opposition? Is it really a good idea to wage wars and to leave the opposition party without formal responsibility for them?

It might be a good idea to do that, or at least it might be good clean fun to snub the opposition, if it were certain that all wars would end promptly, agreeably, and triumphantly. But for hard, bitter, and long wars it is downright folly to let the opposition escape the responsibility. Mr. Truman, if he possessed the faculty of seeing ahead and of seeing the consequences of his decisions, would be demanding that the Congress stand up and be counted.

Had the President done that, he would not now be confronted with the Coudert-Wherry effort to deprive him of his constitutional powers, or with the deeply destructive and demoralizing debate as to whether the Korean war is legal and whether the Eisenhower mission is constitutional. There was never any doubt that the overwhelming majority of the Congress would support the Korean intervention. Nor, had the matter been handled with common sense, would there have been any doubt that the Congress would support by a substantial majority the Eisenhower mission. Mr. Truman's troubles with Congress are self-induced. The whole question of his rights and powers would never have been raised, had he exercised his rights and powers with tact, with discretion, and with a broader understanding of what is involved.

Here, I think, he is getting bad advice from some of his supporters when they cite al the many instances where a President has committed our Armed Forces abroad without prior congressional consultation and approval. Are those who cite all these precedents meaning to say that because the President has often landed troops abroad and engaged in hostilities without going first to Congress for approval—that therefore he ought as a matter of principle never to go to Congress in matters of this sort?

As I read the history, the President has the right and the duty to act for the security of the United States, and need not consult Congress first if to do that would jeopardize the vital interests of the United States, and he may even break the law if in his judgment the highest interests of the United States require it. But at the earliest opportunity the President is accountable to the Congress for his action, and he must seek as soon as the national interest permits it the approval of the Congress for what he has done.

Applied to the Korean war, the President had a right to intervene without the prior approval of Congress, since he had a right to believe that there could be no delay if a great interest was not to be sacrificed. But when the next day Senator TAFT offered to support a resolution approving the President's intervention, Mr. President would have served the Constitution, his policy, and himself had he snapped up Senator TAFT's offer.

Applied to the troop commitment in Germany, it is necessary to remember that there is plenty of time to consult Congress and to obtain an affirmative vote of approval. All the precedents which arise from emergencies that the President had to meet are irrelevant here. So, also, are all the cases where the whole military action by the President was concluded with the forces already in existence and already under his command. The army that is to go to Germany is not yet in existence, and when it is in existence it will require continuing action by the Congress to maintain it.

Is there any historical precedent, which in these essential respects, is at all analogous? I believe not.

We are, in fact, planning to do something which we have never done before. We are planning to station more or less permanently abroad a large American Army. This is not an army of professional soldiers. It is a citizen army that we plan permanently to station abroad. This is a wholly different operation, different in kind and not merely in degree, from sending naval forces abroad, or landing some marines, or maintaining armies of occupation at the end of a war.

This is a new and radical departure in the high policies of the United States, involving great costs, great risks, far-reaching responsibilities, and consequences that are not clearly predictable. I myself have long favored this new and radical policy. But I can think of no surer way to add to its difficulties and dangers than to make it Mr. Truman's personal policy, to exclude the Congress from all personal responsibility for it, and to enter upon it with the Nation uninformed, unconsulted, and divided.

WAIVING OF GOVERNMENT CHECKS BY A DISABLED VETERAN

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a news dispatch which appeared in the January 13 issue of the New York Times. It is very brief. Permit me to read it:

VETERAN WAIVES CHECKS—SAYS UNITED STATES GAVE ENOUGH

SUFFOLK, VA., January 12.—A disabled veteran who was a ditch digger before the war and whom the Government assisted in learning to be a butcher says he doesn't want any more disability checks from the Government. He has even returned two checks totaling $126.40.

"Now I feel like the Government has done enough for me, especially with so many fellows coming back from Korea all shot up," he says, explaining that for 3 years he got $12 to $15 a month disability payments and more than $100 a month for on-the-job training.

The veteran didn't want his name used. He said he was afraid people would think he was "grandstanding."

"There are enough of us sucking the country dry, and it's time we stopped sucking and started giving," he said.

Mr. President, the action of this disabled veteran must make all of us proud—proud of this good citizen and proud of the American spirit which moved him to act as he did.

This man does not stand alone. There are millions like him in this land. There are many Americans in humble places and in high places who are eager to demonstrate their readiness for sacrifice to help their country.

I hope all of us will take to heart the homely and straightforward statement of this veteran: "It's time we stopped sucking and starting giving."

Let us be worthy of the sacrifices made for America and the cause of world freedom in Korea. Here in the Senate we represent the heroic people of a free nation. We must give the kind of unselfish leadership they expect of us.

Let us push all thoughts of personal or partisan advantages away from us when we come to make our great decisions. If we do so, we shall be true to the best traditions of American leaders in times of crisis.

SEDIMENTATION AT HYDRO RESERVOIRS—ARTICLE BY ELMER K. NELSON

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article by Mr. Elmer K. Nelson, entitled, "Sedimentation at Hydro Reservoirs." The article appeared in the magazine Public Utilities Fortnightly.

Mr. Nelson is the staff engineer of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and has been a valued member of that committee's staff for nearly 4 years. The article is a very careful and practical discussion of the problem of controlling sedimentation behind the hydroelectric dams we are building, and I believe it should be made available to every Member of the Senate.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEDIMENTATION AT HYDRO RESERVOIRS

(Hydroelectric dams and other dam structures are of such a lasting nature that they may even defy depreciation estimates. But the usefulness of such structures may be permanently impaired over the long range due to the silting up of reservoirs behind such dams. How rapidly are these dams becoming silted? Will their usefulness eventually approach comparison with the pyramids? This article, by the staff engineer of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, discusses the over-all problem of sedimentation from the standpoint of reservoir construction and erosion control.)

(By Elmer K. Nelson)

In recent years there has been considerable discussion about the problem of silt accumulating in the reservoirs behind our major dams. Questions have been raised as to how long these structures will continue to function before their usefulness may be impaired by silt deposits. In the case of hydroelectric dams the power production capacity of the installation is a matter of obvious concern along this line. How would the demand for power, which has been stimulated by the initial large-capacity output of the plant, be accommodated in the event the hydro potential eventually deteriorated? Would steam plants be required for replacement? How practical is the process of desilting? Officials of the Department of the Interior, its various bureaus, Army engineer spokesmen, have tried to allay such fears. They also have been investigating the actual degree of silting or sedimentation at certain of the major dams. Soil Conservation Service and Forestry Service agents of the Department of Agriculture and members of the Federal Power Commission's river basin survey group have looked into this rather basic problem, posed by nature, affecting the useful life of these expensive structures.

One notable example of such investigations has been that conducted in Lake Mead. The United States Navy and the United States Geological Survey have been looking into the murky waters impounded by Hoover Dam. The Secretary of Interior, as a result of this survey, has been able to announce that the dam has a life expectancy of another 275 years. Everyone knows, Secretary Chapman pointed out, that any dam will eventually fill up with silt and debris deposited by the slowing down of the waters. The answer to how soon this would happen determines the economic feasibility of any such project.

For long-life expectation, Arrowrock Reservoir, on the Boise River, stands first in the geographical group. In its 32 years of operation, silt has taken only 2.76 percent of its capacity. The slow rate, which indicates that it will serve more than 1,100 years before filling, is explained by the low erosion rate on the heavily wooded slopes through which the river drains. Poorest of the silting prospects is that of Guernsey Reservoir, which catches the North Platte River in Wyoming. In 20 years it has lost one-third of its capacity.

The Department of Interior estimates that even such a high sedimentation rate will leave it a useful life beyond its estimated payout time of 40 years. But for corrective purposes the Department apparently anticipated construction of another reservoir upstream, to reduce the rate to less than 1 percent a year.

Before considering the pertinent factors concerning the actual siltation picture in the United States, some basic definitions may assist the reader to grasp the over-all impact of the siltation problem.

First of all, what is silt or sedimentation? Sedimentation, for the purpose of this discussion, is the disposal of the products of erosion from the land surfaces of the earth. Exposed rocks of all kinds are continually subjected to the influences of temperature, wind, and water, which is to say they are affected by the weather. The principal interest in the disintegration of rocks, and in the erosion of land areas, is in the movement of the loosened particles, particularly by wind and water.

In the United States relatively little sediment is believed to be moved by winds. In the more arid portions of the West aeolian (wind-borne) sedimentation is, however, taking place. In the past, vast areas on the earth were blanketed by loess, a kind of soil, which is chiefly composed of aeolian deposits. But as of the present time, from year to year, the average annual wind-blown deposits are not noticeably large. If they were multiplied by, say, 10,000,000 years the results become important. Most of the destructive erosion in the Yellow River Basin in China, for example, occurs upon aeolian deposits, which, by their nature, are poorly cemented and are readily dissolved by rain or flood waters. (This kind of soil is to be distinguished, therefore, from clay or other well-bound soils which resist surface runoff much better.) It has been estimated that the earth loads moved from west to east, in this Chinese river basin, probably exceed 1,000,000 acre-feet annually. This large amount of soil shift is by wind and water. Geologists think that such shifts of masses are chiefly responsible for the earthquakes occurring in that section of the world.

[1] Paleozoic: An era characterized by the culmination of nearly all classes of invertebrates except insects. In its latter epochs land plants, amphibians, and reptiles first appeared. Mesozoic: The era was the age of dinosaurs, of marine and flying reptiles, of ganoid fishes, and of cycads and evergreen trees. Cenozoic: An era marked by a rapid evolution of the mammals and birds, of grasses, shrubs, and higher flowering plants, and by but little change in the invertebrates.

The concern of planners of public works, particularly for multipurpose projects in the West, is the effect of stream-borne sediments upon the economic feasibility of the works. Engineers, both publicly and privately employed, have recognized the many technical problems inherent in studies of the origin and disposal, of the chemical and physical natures, and of the behavior of sediments transported, and soluble minerals contained in surface waters. Fortunately there is now general support of continued comprehensive studies in this complex field.

The most common question is, When will a given reservoir be filled with silt? The engineer seldom has been able to answer this apparently simple question with a direct answer for the good reason that the answer is not simple. It is, in fact, so complicated that predictions on it are but "educated" guesses. Final answers can come only when some storage units actually fill and the sediment is permitted to consolidate. Stream-borne sediments are composed of materials varying from colloidal clay, a gelatinous substance, to large boulders. The load capacity of a stream depends upon the velocity of flow. The velocity is dependent upon the hydraulic gradient (the influence of gravity), and upon the characteristics of the channel. These factors are not constant in any reach of a natural stream, because their beds are constantly changing. Where a stream enters a channel reservoir, especially one of changing water surface elevations, other variable factors also enter.

When mountain streams emerge upon plains the gradients flatten out. The first deltas appear as small piles of debris consisting of the coarser materials. These tend to spread the flows into distributaries. These, in turn, result in further reduction in velocity, and the water-borne sediments are deposited with the currents traveling the farthest distances. Deltas are built over long periods of time, the streams playing over them as old channels fill and the new ones are cut by water, which dropped portions of their burden. In this way the water flow gains ability to shift older deposits to other portions of the deltas. Uncontrolled streams which flow from side to side over their deltas continually tend to alter their character and to increase the areas.

Along the flood plains of the larger streams, there are continuous changes due to much the same causes as affect delta building. The alluvial flood plains gradually build up, but channels also fill as the bed load deepens. Under certain flood flow conditions beds of streams have been moved up into bodily suspension (flowing mud) and carried onto the adjacent flood plains. Large areas of older alluvial deposits forming the flood plains may be moved to new positions downstream. In short, valleys of major streams are unstable, all alluvial sediments tending to move toward the seas or toward the bottoms of inland basins as each flood crest passes.

It has been noted that the channel and the flood plain of a large stream rise gradually. Although there are downstream movements of bed loads and the materials of the flood plains, the inflow of silt from tributary areas is generally greater than the volume actually moving down the valley.

It is for these reasons that it is risky to encroach upon the flood plain of a major river.

So much by way of brief preview of the over-all sedimentation picture, as the present geologic age experiences that process. The origins of the water-borne materials, presently of concern to planning in the United States, are the sedimentary deposits of both recent and ancient times. Sedimentation is a grand natural phenomenon. Since the beginning of the Paleozoic era, 500,000,000 years ago, there has been measured on the North American continent some 50 miles of sedimentary deposits. The extent and occurrence of erosion from land surfaces, as reflected in sediments of known age, are summarized in the table on page 795, beginning with the oldest.

The principal rivers of this country are often the greatest hazards to life and property. They are subject to flood flows now known to be unpredictable because the history of precipitation and runoff is too brief. Protection of municipal and agricultural developments on the flood plains by reservoir regulation, by channel confinement within levees, and bypasses, has given engineers much valuable data.

Through some leveed river reaches suspended materials have been discharged without channel aggradation for several decades. Engineers know that conditions are so variable that this cannot be accomplished in all cases. It is reported that silty flows of the Nile River, at the Aswan Dam, are passed through, and only the clear flows which follow are retained in storage, thereby preserving the storage capacity of the reservoir. Most streams do not have such flow characteristics. About 15 years ago an eminent American engineer, J. C. Stevens, wrote:

"Man cannot hope to halt the processes of mountain erosion and plain building. The land he cultivates could not exist except for these forces. He must expect that rains will gully his fields, or cover them with mountain debris, and that streams will continue to carry sediments that will fill the canals and reservoirs."

The writer spent his early boyhood on the western plains, where the normal annual precipitation is about 15 inches. He experienced dust storms of great violence and duration. And this was before the advent of trough plowing and other practices which are popularly held unduly responsible for latter-day erosion. At that time there was no overgrazing of the prairies. Only a fraction of a percent of the lands were farmed and only natural conditions were obtained respecting the land areas. The dust bowl then was not manmade. A noted geologist once said that a 10-percent reduction in average wetness and similar increase in wind would bring about erosion in the arid West at a rate which would make much of the area uninhabitable. If severe drought periods were followed immediately by sustained seasons of heavy precipitation erosion and removal of windblown materials by surface waters would be relatively rapid. The optimum condition is doubtless an average weather, without extremes of wind and precipitation, where native vegetation can flourish in desert and semiarid regions.

The origins of water-borne sediments are chiefly, as above indicated, large areas of poorly cemented geological formations of both recent and ancient ages. In some basins where most of the land area has been used for agricultural purposes for a few decades the erosion problem is being studied in the light of land-use operations. There is little disagreement on the desirability of improvement in soil-conservation and erosion-control practices, when real feasibility is demonstrated. The determination of feasibility should be based upon all of the benefits and not solely upon one or two.

The slogan, "Save the priceless heritage of our top soil," does not always express the sole reason for unlimited expenditures for soil conservation. Many agricultural soils are formed from the existing clays, shales, and sands of the formations at hand, and, for the most part, they are formed, in this country, more rapidly than their removal by erosion. The effects of the eroded materials upon the streams carrying these loads, and upon storage and other flow-control structures, are always detrimental. The maintenance of the functions of these structures is sometimes of more concern than the loss of the soil because of ultimate damage downstream in a basin. Viewed in this perspective, soil conserved, and thus withheld from streams, may have a value of many times its single-purpose value on a farm.

Studies by the Soil Conservation Service, Department of Agriculture, are now progressing to the point where definite proposals for retarding erosion soon can be presented. The most forward-looking step to date was the creation within the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee of a subcommittee on sedimentation in 1946. Its present chairman is Carl B. Brown, of the Soil Conservation Service.

The first technical meeting of national scope on sedimentation problems was held in Denver, Colo., in May 1948, under the sponsorship of this subcommittee. In his opening address Chairman Brown said that the harmful effects of sedimentation may be divided into five major categories, as follows:

1. Sediment concentration in water may be harmful even though the stream is fully competent to carry all of its load without deposition. High turbidity may destroy the value of the stream for fish and wildlife. It makes the stream or lake undesirable for swimming. Coarse sediment in transportation may damage power turbines. Fine sediment must be filtered at considerable cost before the water is acceptable for public, domestic, and industrial uses.

2. Sedimentation in improved channels, floodways, ditches, and canals used for navigation, drainage, irrigation, and flood control must be prevented or the sediment removed if these improvements are to function effectively.

3. Sedimentation in reservoirs causes loss of storage capacity, which depreciates the value of the storage development and causes other losses, such as increased evaporation, decreased recreational opportunities, and impaired esthetic values.

4. Deposition on land, improvements, and habitats, mainly during flood flows, causes severe damages in many areas to agricultural land, to urban areas, to transportation facilities, and to native wildlife.

5. In addition to these direct damages, aggradation of stream channels and natural or artificial floodways has the effect of increasing flood stage for any given discharge. Consequently, the area inundated and the extent of floodwater damages may be increasing as a result of sedimentation, although the volume and rate of runoff remain substantially the same. As floods affect all classes of enterprise and resources, this is an all-inclusive form of damage.

Thomas Maddock, Jr., of the Branch of Project Planning, Bureau of Reclamation, in discussing reservoir problems, noted that reservoirs do not silt up from the bottom altogether, but that sediments may settle in the upper or flood-space portions in greater amounts than in the dead-storage space. He also directed attention to the need for continuous reservoir surveys for determining the changes in reservoir operation schedules necessitated by reductions in capacity of the spaces set aside for the various purposes for which the reservoirs were authorized.

Mr. Maddock concluded with this statement:

"What I would like to point out, in closing, is that reduction in acreage of irrigated areas will have to take place before the last reservoir site is utilized. We can expect full development of our western streams before our present reservoirs are filled with sediment. Water will not be available to provide for the excessive losses that will take place in these reservoirs in later periods of their life, and, for evaporation from newly constructed reservoirs. We therefore must, to the extent possible, preserve what we now have."

Gail A. Hathaway, special assistant, Office of Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, in his comprehensive statement on sedimentation problems related to floodways, channels, and harbors, summarized the more important problems as follows:

"Sedimentation problems are encountered in the development and use of alluvial rivers from the headwaters to the mouth, extending generally to the river deltas or outer bars of coastal harbors. The most important of these problems usually relate to:

"(a) Obstruction of floodways and navigation channels by deposition of sediment.

"(b) Major changes in channel alinement resulting from deposition and scour in unstabilized channels.

"(c) Blocking of outlets of sewers, water intakes, and drainage canals by sediment.

"(d) Destruction of river improvements, bridges, and similar works as the result of scour and bed movements.

"(e) Readjustment of hydraulic conditions below newly constructed reservoirs, resulting from retrogression, deterioration of channel efficiencies caused by storage or diversion of normal flows and intermittent releases, changes in channel alinement, and similar factors."

The proceedings of this meeting were published by the Bureau of Reclamation.

Suspended sediments in streams are measured by sampling the moving fluid and determining what portion of the flow, by weight, these sediments represent. When the suspended particles first settle out, space they occupy as a sedimentary deposit is quite different in water than on land where dehydration and condensation take place. The sediment in some reservoirs has been found to weigh about 45 pounds per cubic foot. The same sediment consolidated on a river delta may weigh nearly 90 pounds per cubic foot.

It may well be then that it would be possible to drain a rapidly silted reservoir, dry the sediment, and thereby recapture about 50 percent of its original capacity.

The ultimate weight of sediments in reservoirs is only an estimate at best. Recent investigations show that the 1935-49 annual average sediment deposition in Lake Mead occupies 105,500 acre-feet, while the estimated silt in the flows passing the Grand Canyon station average about 150,000 acre-feet annually, assuming a dry sediment weight of 70 pounds per cubic foot. There is additional drainage area between the Grand Canyon station and Hoover Dam of 30,000 square miles which produces considerable sediment. Allowing for some silt discharge, there is still a considerable discrepancy, unless these values are used with proper understanding of the periods of record. Most engineers now believe the life of Lake Mead, as a storage and power project under present river storage conditions, will exceed 300 years. Additional upstream reservoirs and erosion control could increase this to 1,000 years. Long before 300 years have passed erosion will be abated to a considerable degree for the logical reason that the storage is worth too much to ignore the causes of its reduction.

It has been estimated that presently observed erosion in the arid West results in suspended sediments in streams that are derived in approximately equal amounts from (1) channel changes in the flood plains of main streams, (2) gullying on the smaller tributaries, and (3) sheet erosion of tablelands. When these quantities become more exactly allocable the costs of alleviative measures may be accurately evaluated, and true benefit-cost ratios calculated. Urgency in these problems is recognized even if a permanent solution is not likely. It is a matter of economics. Not only does storage cost tremendously but reservoir sites are limited.

Data supplied by the Bureau of Reclamation and Corps of Engineers on transported sediments are not to be assumed as final. Rather, they are approximations under existing conditions of erosion opportunity. The calculated quantities are based on weights which are, on an assumed value of the weight of a unit volume, in turn, reduced to volumes. It is not claimed that the measurements of weights of suspended and moving sediments are absolute, nor that unit volumes, as calculated, represent the volumes under all conditions of age and cover. The values shown are therefore usable only by those competent to understand the chemistry and physics of soils, the several subdivisions of hydraulics, and the pertinent elements of physical geology. These subjects are highly specialized and expanding. They involve research and applied science. It may be correctly concluded that sufficient funds must be made available to carry on adequately the investigations prerequisite to proper planning by the cooperating agencies.

With the qualifications suggested the data presented in table on page 799 are submitted for key gaging stations on some principal streams, the sources being noted above.

The foregoing data as heretofore noted, are not necessarily comparable for all points on a stream or in a common basin. They represent, rather, the bare preliminary data now available, and are therefore subject to revision. The stations in the Missouri Basin indicate that the silt burden below the mouth of the Yellowstone River comes chiefly from the Yellowstone. In the Missouri River Basin the deposition of silt under present conditions is not a problem, most of it being carried to the Mississippi. But the construcure of reservoirs for irrigation, flood control, and power purposes above Sioux City, Iowa, must give consideration to their ultimate filling with stream-borne sediments now totaling at least 50,000 acre-feet annually. Consideration, in particular, involves the design as well as the operation and maintenance of the reservoir system.

The capacity of Fort Peck Reservoir and other storage reservoirs of the ultimate total built and to be built above is in the Missouri Basin, and will probably exceed 30,000,000 acre-feet. In the Yellowstone Basin the ultimate total will probably exceed 2,000,000 acre-feet, and this storage will be affected by siltation. Downstream from Fort Peck Dam main-stem reservoirs will ultimately have a combined capacity of 40,000,000 to 45,000,000 acre-feet. These multipurpose reservoirs have control of all residual flows from a large drainage area subject to relatively heavy erosion, and here the treatment of the area is not complicated by a highly unfavorable ratio of canyon exposures.

In the upper Colorado Basin, above the mouth of the Little Colorado River, a study is being made of a storage system which, as to main stream locations on the Colorado, the Green, and the San Juan Rivers, will ultimately aggregate about 48,000,000 acre-feet. These units, some to a greater degree, will all be affected by sedimentation. It is conceded that erosion in much of the drainage area above Hoover Dam will be difficult to control, and that here is a complex problem of first magnitude.

The sedimentation of reservoirs in the Colorado and the Missouri Basins, as noted heretofore, is a factor in design, but the sources of these sediments and their nature are also matters of concern.

When additional silt-sampling stations are operated it will be possible to isolate the portions of the drainage areas which produce the most sediment per unit area. The critical areas may then be surveyed in detail and the sources of the sediment discovered. As was pointed out heretofore, over-all sedimentation statistics only show whether erosion is of importance in a particular watershed. The data submitted, for example, can be arranged to show that a portion of southeastern Utah, in the Colorado River Basin, contributes three times the average silt per unit area produced by the whole basin above Lake Mead. Sampling at stream-flow stations must be supplemented by sufficient precipitation measurements to enable scientists to analyze storm routes and the intensity as well as the quantity of rain, snowfall, and snow melt.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SMITH OF NEW JERSEY ON THE FIVE-POINT CEASE-FIRE FORMULA FOR KOREA

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to read into the body of the RECORD a brief statement I released on Sunday, January 14, after I had noted in the press the United Nations action in approving the five-point cease-fire formula for Korea.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from New Jersey may proceed.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The statement which I have obtained unanimous consent to read is as follows:

I am greatly disturbed by the unbelievable news today that the United States has agreed to a five-point cease-fire formula for Korea, which, among other things, provides:

"Immediately following agreement on a cease fire, the creation of a body by the General Assembly to achieve a settlement—conforming to the UN Charter and existing international obligations—of far-eastern problems, including Formosa and a UN seat for Communist China. On this body would be representatives of the United States, Britain, Russia, and Communist China."

This seems to mean, bluntly, that the UN has sacrificed moral principle for expediency.

How the UN can deal with the defiant aggressor and negotiate the possible rewards of aggression is beyond my comprehension.

What the members of the UN should do as a minimum at this moment is:

1. Declare the Chinese Communists to be the aggressors in Korea.

2. Withdraw the recognition of the Chinese Communists Peiping government by those governments which have hitherto recognized Peiping.

3. Serve notice immediately that the Chinese Communist troops must be withdrawn from Korea under penalty of (a) immediate bombing of those targets in North Korea and Manchuria such as airfields, depots, ammunition dumps, and supply lines that UN military commanders deem of strategic value to the Communists; (b) the imposition of economic sanctions on the Chinese Communists under article 41 of the UN Charter, cutting off all shipments by member countries to Chinese Communist territory, and (c) the full support of all anti-Communist movements in China and other far eastern countries.

In the event of the unwillingness of the other UN nations to support such a program of uncompromising opposition to this flagrant and defiant Korean aggression the United States may be compelled to reexamine its whole relationship to the UN. This is not any denial of our support of collective security and the principles of the UN Charter.

It is an affirmation that even a temporary defeat with honor is to be preferred to an appeasement for the sake of a temporary expediency based on fear. Moral principles can never be surrendered to physical force.

We are facing the issue of the very survival of the United Nations.

I also ask unanimous consent that at the close of my remarks there be inserted in the body of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the New York Times on Monday, January 15, on the same subject and which was entitled "The Moral Issue."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MORAL ISSUE

On December 1, 1950, President Truman sent a message to Congress describing the crisis produced by Communist China's intervention in Korea. In this message he said: "The moral issue now is the same as it was in June. The aggression of the Chinese Communists is a direct assault upon the United Nations, and upon the principles of international law and order which are its foundation. By their action the Chinese Communist leaders have proved themselves lawbreakers in the community of nations."

Can these words be reconciled with the American acceptance of the five-point cease-fire proposal which the Assembly's Political Committee has sent to Peiping? On the principle that no cease-fire can be bad they can be reconciled. But the details of this action, fully considered, include much that must be a cause of regret and apprehension to all friends of the United Nations—that is, to all friends of peace, security, and freedom.

The five-point proposal contains not a single syllable remotely suggesting any wrongdoing on the part of Red China. It contains not one word indicating that we or our friends are even mildly displeased with the government whose troops are at this moment trying to annihilate United Nations soldiers in Korea. The military defeat, the lost battle, could not be prevented. The courage of the wounded and the dead, the valiant efforts of the living have not been enough. But we do not have to accept a moral defeat. We do not have to submit—we cannot safely submit—to what General Romulo, in his impassioned speech on Saturday, described as intimidation and blackmail.

At this moment the important point for us in the five-point proposal is point one, which calls for a cease-fire. This means, if it means anything, that there can be no peace talks with Communist China until a cease-fire is in operation—that is until Communist China has ceased her aggression in Korea, or has at least desisted in her attempts to extend the area of aggression.

But what General Romulo was thinking of was point five, in which we would agree to sit with Britain, Russia, and Communist China on a committee to discuss far-eastern problems, including, among others, those of Formosa and of representation of China in the United Nations. When President Truman ordered the Seventh Fleet into the Straits of Formosa on June 27, 1950, he laid down the stipulation that the determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan or consideration by the United Nations. Thus, on the record, we can consistently take up this question. But it ought to be clearly understood that we will not accept as good and righteous the forcible reconquest of the island by the Peiping regime, and that we will not vote for the admission of Communist China to the United Nations until she has given convincing evidence that she has abandoned her policies of direct and indirect aggression, in Korea and elsewhere. And for such evidence we may have to wait a long time.

We want no war, limited or otherwise, with China. Every humane instinct cries out against such a war, every sentiment of prudence demands that it be avoided. But let us have a care that we do not apply to great and powerful nations a different moral yardstick from the one we use in judging small and weak nations. We cannot prevent all wrongdoing in this unhappy world, but we need not condone it, we need not call it peace. Let us do all we can to bring about a real and lasting peace. Let us meanwhile avoid commitments we cannot fulfill. But let us not sell our souls. Let us not stand silent at Lake Success if Communist China presumes to attempt to dictate a conqueror's peace to a beaten United Nations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I have taken up with the majority leader and with the minority leader the question of acting on one of the nominations on the Executive Calendar; and at this time, as the representative at the moment of the Armed Services Committee, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider the nomination of Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., of Florida, to be Federal Civil Defense Administrator. I make this request, sir, because it is very important that the Senate take action on this nomination as promptly as possible.

This nomination has the unanimous favorable report of the Committee on Armed Services.

A subcommittee, consisting of the chairman of the committee, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] considered the testimony submitted on the nomination of Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., to be the Administrator of the Federal Civil Defense Administration, by representatives of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and also heard testimony by Governor Caldwell. After hearing that testimony, the subcommittee unanimously reported to the full committee that the nomination should be confirmed, and the full committee has so decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination of Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., of Florida, to be Federal Civil Defense Administrator. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith of the confirmation.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, submitting the nomination of Leroy D. Stinebower to be the representative of the United States of America on the Economic, Employment, and Development Commission of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for a term of 3 years, together with other messages from the President submitting nominations which will be referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will resume the consideration of legislative business.

APPOINTMENT OF SENATOR BUTLER OF NEBRASKA TO BE HONORARY DEPUTY SHERIFF OF DOUGLAS COUNTY, NEBR.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, this body is called the greatest deliberative body in the world. It is a unique, a distinct, and a great honor to be a Member of the United States Senate. We all affirm that in our hearts. But there are some honors that may transcend even the honor of being a Member of the United States Senate—the office of delegate at large to some great convention, Ambassador Extraordinary, Minister Plenipotentiary to some foreign nation, the heads of the great bureaus of control, positions in the Army and Navy, but I think an opportunity will be lost and we shall miss a trick in the Senate this morning if I do not, as a humble Member of this body, rise to call the attention of the Senate of the United States and of the people throughout the country to a very signal honor which has come to one of our Members. I shall take pleasure in doing so if the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska, sitting to my right, will rise.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska rose.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, on the honest, manly bosom of the Senator from Nebraska is a gold star, the meaning of which is that he was appointed to the high and signal position of honorary deputy sheriff of Douglas County, Nebr. He is the envy of all the other 95 Senators. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I desire to thank the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire for his expression.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Mr. WHERRY obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Nebraska expects to discuss his resolution, Senate Resolution 8, and I wish to propound a unanimous-consent request at this time.

I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 8 be made the unfinished business, and that it be—

Ordered, That on the calendar day of January 23, 1951, at the hour of 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, under the limitation of debate hereinafter provided, upon any amendment, motion, or appeal that may be pending or that may thereafter be proposed to the resolution (S. Res. 8, submitted by Mr. WHERRY on January 8, 1951), and upon the question of agreeing to the resolution itself: Provided, (1) That after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m., debate upon any amendment or motion, including appeals, and upon the resolution itself, shall be limited, not to exceed 20 minutes, to be equally divided, and controlled respectively by the mover of such amendment or motion and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]; (2) that no amendment or motion that is not germane or with reference to the subject matter of the said resolution shall be received; and (3) that no vote on any amendment or motion, including appeal, proposed to the said resolution, shall be had prior to the said hour of 3 p. m. on said day.

Ordered further, That on the said day of the 23d of January 1951, the time between 12 o'clock noon and the said hour of 3 o'clock p. m., shall be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the said resolution, and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona whether the unanimous-consent request would include a substitute. I heard the word "amendment" read, but does it also include a substitute resolution of the same purport?

Mr. McFARLAND. It would include a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A substitute is an amendment, so a substitute would be included, in any event.

Mr. McFARLAND. I should like to inquire of the Chair whether it is necessary that we first have a quorum call.

Mr. WHERRY. We have just had a quorum call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum call is not required under the rule.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I understand this is a unanimous-consent request that is being made by the majority leader.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct.

Mr. McCARRAN. Would it inconvenience the Senator from Arizona if the matter were allowed to be held in abeyance for a little while, in order that we may examine it? I have no desire to delay it, but I desire to know what is in it.

Mr. McFARLAND. It is a proposed agreement regarding a simple resolution, and I hope the Senate will accept it. I submit a copy of the proposed agreement to the Senator from Nevada for his perusal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When Senators have concluded their conversation, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Reserving the right to object, in my own right——

Mr. WHERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. As I understand, the resolution simply provides that at 3 o'clock on next Tuesday the resolution referred to will be taken up. Am I correct?

Mr. McFARLAND. No. I have asked that it be made the unfinished business, and that it be voted upon next Tuesday, together with any motion, and so forth. Of course, as the Senator knows, we have discussed the possibility of the resolution being referred to an appropriate committee, and such a motion will be made.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand.

Mr. McFARLAND. That will be voted on first.

Mr. CONNALLY. Do I correctly understand that it is proposed to make the resolution the unfinished business at this time?

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why is that?

Mr. McFARLAND. I think it must be made the unfinished business before we can enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on it. There is at the moment no business before the Senate, anyway.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that, but I am not aware of any such rule as the Senator suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion can be made at any time. The Senator from Arizona is in order. The motion can be made on the resolution, as the Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian, whose advice is strongly persuasive with the Chair.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not disagreeing.

Mr. McFARLAND. The distinguished minority leader wanted it to be made the unfinished business, and I could see no objection to it. I am merely endeavoring to obtain the agreement, in order that we may vote on the resolution next Tuesday, accommodating as many Senators as possible.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the proposed unanimous-consent agreement provide for debate on the resolution? The Senator said something about the time from 12 o'clock until 3.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. McFARLAND. On next Tuesday it is proposed that the time be divided equally between the distinguished Senator from Texas and the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, but before that time there will be plenty of time for debate. Every Senator who desires to do so will have an opportunity to speak on it this week, or, if he does not, he may speak on something else. I expect that the Senate will be in session so that that may be done.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I am concerned about is that the reference to a vote at 3 o'clock Tuesday does not mean an agreement to vote on the resolution, but simply provides that any motions, amendments, substitutes, and all that, shall be first considered, after which the vote will come on the resolution. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct. Of course, the votes on motions and amendments would necessarily come first.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. McFARLAND. Then following their disposition, the vote would come on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the fact that a motion to commit takes precedence over amendments.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. May I make one observation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. What the Senator from Texas has suggested be done would be in accordance with the required parliamentary procedure in connection with this matter anyway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. There would first be a vote on an amendment, then a vote on a motion, and finally, after all such matters were out of the way, there would be a vote on the resolution. Am I not correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct, in the opinion of the Chair. It depends on whether a motion to refer is agreed to.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, the resolution has never been referred to a committee, as I understand, so a motion to refer would be in order also.

Mr. WHERRY. Any motion would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to refer would be in order.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question. This resolution is in the negative. If a substitute were offered which was in the affirmative, would it be considered as an amendment to the resolution in the negative? It seems to me the word "substitute" should be added in order to make it absolutely certain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A substitute is always considered as an amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I respectfully state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the resolution is not in the negative. I do not care whether he offers one in the affirmative, in the negative, or halfway between, I shall be glad to include it in the unanimous-consent request so that it may be subject to a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the agreement is entered into.

The unanimous-consent agreement, as reduced to writing, is as follows:

Ordered, That on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 23, 1951, at the hour of 3 p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, under the limitation of debate hereinafter provided, upon any amendment or motion (including appeals) that may be pending or that may thereafter be proposed to Senate Resolution 8, submitted by Mr. WHERRY on January 8, 1951, as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the formulation of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress."

And upon the question of agreeing to the resolution itself: Provided, (1) That after said hour of 3 p. m., debate upon any amendment or motion (including appeals) and upon the resolution itself shall be limited to not exceeding 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Mr. CONNALLY); (2) that no amendment or motion that is not germane or relevant to the subject matter of the said resolution shall be received; and (3) that no vote on any amendment or motion (including appeals) proposed to the said resolution shall be had prior to the said hour of 3 p. m.

Ordered further, That on said day of Tuesday, January 23, 1951, the time between 12 o'clock noon and said hour of 3 p. m. shall be equally divided between those favoring and those opposed to the said resolution and controlled, respectively, by Mr. WHERRY and Mr. CONNALLY.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to have the clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 8, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the formulation of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to modify the resolution by striking out the word "formulation", which is the fifth word in line 4, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "adoption."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to amend his own resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. But, Mr. President, he cannot make me agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am aware of the difficulty involved in getting the Senator from Texas to agree to many things; but let me state the reasons for the modification. Some Senators have come to me and said that the word "formulation" ran only to the negotiations in connection with the forming of an army. So I said I should be glad to strike out that word and to insert the word "adoption." As Senators read the resolution—I think it has been misinterpreted and misunderstood by many persons—they will see it provides that there shall be no assignment of troops for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty—it is limited to the North Atlantic Treaty—until the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress. That is all that is involved in the resolution. I want to make that clear.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the distinguished Senator to the fact that the resolution is not now subject to amendment and will not be so subject until next Tuesday, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator introducing a bill or resolution has the right to modify it, has he not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. McFARLAND. He has a right to modify it, but he cannot amend it, under the unanimous-consent agreement, until 3 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 8, now that it has been modified, reads as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

The meaning of this resolution is plain. It neither approves nor disapproves the sending of United States ground forces to Atlantic treaty countries to become part of a peacetime international army.

Senators in voting for this resolution in no way commit themselves for or against the sending of American boys to Western Europe, to become part of a peacetime army.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says that under his resolution it is simply provided that the sending of United States troops to Germany, as a part of a peacetime army, is forbidden.

Mr. WHERRY. Has not the distinguished Senator read the resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have heard it read by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I just read it, but I did not say anything about sending troops to Germany.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say anything about sending troops to Germany.

Mr. WHERRY. That is exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment——

Mr. WHERRY. I have the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I asked a question.

Mr. WHERRY. And I have answered it.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the Senator has not answered it.

Mr. WHERRY. The resolution does not say anything about sending troops to Germany.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not talking about Germany; I am talking about sending them anywhere in Europe. Under the Senator's resolution, even though war should break out in Europe, we could not send, under the resolution, a single foot soldier to Europe until Congress had passed on the question.

Mr. WHERRY. That is not correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is correct?

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator admonishes me many times to be still for a few moments, and if the Senator from Texas will remain still for a few moments, he will know what is in the resolution.

To begin with, it is limited only to sending troops to Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty. That is one thing. So that eliminates half the question the Senator asked. The other thing is that, notwithstanding the fact that the President might or might not have the power under the Constitution, outside the treaty, the President of the United States should make no commitment prior to the time that Congress determines whether or not it wants to send American boys abroad to become part of an integrated army. Prior to that time, under the resolution, no commitment shall be made.

If the resolution should be adopted by the Senate, as the Senator indicated in his press release this morning, Congress would determine the policy. When the President presents his program, that is the time to discuss whether or not Congress will determine whether American boys will be sent as part of an integrated army in Europe. All this resolution does is to advise the President of the sense of the Senate.

The Senator was quoted in the newspapers this morning as stating that he would not object to letting Congress make that determination. If that be correct, there is no difference between the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Nebraska except that, before that determination is made, no commitment shall be made.

Mr. McFARLAND. I do not know what the newspapers may have said in connection with my statement——

Mr. WHERRY. I was referring to the statement of the Senator from Texas. If I mentioned the majority leader, I want the RECORD to be corrected. I was referring to a statement made by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. McFARLAND. I do not think any of us will object to a vote upon the question as to whether armed forces should be used to implement the North Atlantic Pact, but a vote on that question and a vote on the Senator's resolution are two different propositions. As I understand the Senator's resolution, it provides that no Ground Forces of the United States shall be assigned to duty in the European area. I take it that the Senator does not include the Navy or the Air Corps.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to present the case in an orderly fashion. I think most of these questions will be answered in the course of my remarks. In order to keep my argument intact I shall ask Senators to wait until I have finished my address. Then I shall be very glad to answer all questions.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. If I yield to anyone, I shall yield to the majority leader.

Mr. President, if the majority leader wants to perfect the resolution so as to include all military forces, it is agreeable to me. However, I want a basic assurance. If the distinguished Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, could give the assurance that no commitment will be made by the executive branch of the Government as to the sending of any armed force to Europe until Congress determines the policy with respect to it, I would be happy to withdraw the resolution. I do not wish the resolution to be considered as a resolution which would decide whether or not we shall send troops to Europe. The resolution provides for only one thing, namely, that the question of commitments by the President of the United States shall be held in abeyance until Congress itself has made the determination.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, perhaps the distinguished Senator from Nebraska has answered the question I had in mind. Unfortunately, I shall have to leave the floor and shall be absent during the delivery of a part of his able address. I have a few questions I should like to ask him before I leave.

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to yield now. However, after I begin my address, I should like to make it without interruptions. The questions which have been asked convince me that the purpose of the resolution has been misunderstood. I shall be glad to accept modifications of the resolution if the main purpose of the resolution is preserved. What I am attempting to do—and I think most Senators agree with me—is to provide that no commitment shall be made by the President of the United States, whether he has authority or does not have authority, for American boys to be assigned to an integrated army in Europe. If it is desired, any other military service in addition to ground forces can be included in the resolution. However, it is intended that no commitment shall be made until the Congress of the United States has determined the policy. The resolution is limited only to the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Mr. McFARLAND. Will the Senator answer my question as to whether or not the provisions of the resolution apply to the Navy and the Air Force?

Mr. WHERRY. No; it applies only to the provisions of the North Atlantic Pact. In the North Atlantic Treaty, as I shall explain later, we were assured that the character of the aid to be furnished would be decided by Congress, not by the President of the United States.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the resolution include the Navy and Air Force? Would the resolution prohibit the use of the Navy and Air Force to implement the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. WHERRY. No; but if the Senator from Arizona would like to include such a prohibition, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. McFARLAND. No; the Senator from Nebraska misunderstands me. I am simply trying to find out what the resolution includes.

Mr. WHERRY. As I shall explain a little later, it has been stated by the President of the United States, both in the press and over the radio, that he has authority to send ground troops to Europe without consulting Congress. The only forces that have been mentioned by the President have been land forces. My contention is that for the purposes of the North Atlantic Pact the President of the United States does not have authority to commit American boys to an integrated, international army in Europe until the Congress of the United States determines the policy. It is as simple as that.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I am always glad to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. McFARLAND. I thank the Senator. As I understand, General Eisenhower is a member of the Ground Forces. Is the resolution intended to prohibit General Eisenhower from doing the work he is trying to do? Undoubtedly a commitment was made to send him to Europe.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, my distinguished friend from Arizona is going far beyond even the realms of imagination. The Senator knows what is meant by land forces in an integrated army in Europe. He knows what is meant by the term. I am referring only to land forces in an integrated, international army in Europe. However, if for any reason he doubts what I have said, I shall be very glad to have him suggest an amendment to the resolution accordingly. I am serious about the resolution, and I hope the majority leader will support it. I am merely trying to do with reference to the North Atlantic Treaty what was done with reference to the United Nations agreement. The resolution provides simply that prior to the time Congress makes a determination of policy no commitment can be made by the President of the United States.

Mr. McFARLAND. Before we act on the resolution we should find out what it means.

Mr. WHERRY. If the majority leader will let me make my speech, I am sure it will answer his questions.

Mr. McFARLAND. I have only one or two more questions to ask, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the resolution include the Marine Corps?

Mr. WHERRY. My answer would be the same with reference to the Marine Corps as it is with reference to the Navy or any other military contingent that might be sent to Europe under the North Atlantic Treaty. If the Senator wants me to do so, I shall be very glad to amend the resolution to include not only the Ground Forces but any other military contingent which would be assigned or committed under the North Atlantic Treaty. The resolution would not prevent the President of the United States from ordering the Navy to go to any part of the world, provided he meets the conditions under which he is ordering it.

Mr. McFARLAND. The Senator misunderstands me. I am not trying to perfect his resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish the Senator would perfect it.

Mr. McFARLAND. I am merely trying to find out what it means.

Mr. WHERRY. I am trying to explain it to the distinguished Senator.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does it or does it not include the Marine Corps?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as I have stated time and time again, the resolution provides that the President shall not make a commitment of land forces.

Mr. McFARLAND. What is meant by land forces?

Mr. WHERRY. A commitment of land forces to an international, integrated army in Europe. Under the resolution such a commitment could not be made until Congress had first determined the policy. If the Senator is anxious to include the Marine Corps, or if he thinks the President would commit the Marine Corps under the North Atlantic Treaty, he can take care of the situation with an amendment to the resolution. I am not particularly anxious about the point. I am anxious about committing land forces to Western Europe. That is what bothers me.

Mr. McFARLAND. I regret that the Senator from Nebraska has not answered my question. It is important to find out what is meant by land forces. If we are to issue a directive to the executive branch of the Government, it should be clearly stated. We should know what the resolution means.

Mr. WHERRY. I desire to explain the resolution.

Mr. McFARLAND. I should like to ask one more question, if I may.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well; I yield. However, I think the questions which the distinguished majority leader is asking will be answered in the course of my remarks.

Mr. McFARLAND. May I ask one more question?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield, even though I think that if I yield again we shall keep on going around and around, in a sort of round robin, and we shall not get anywhere. The Senator has had it explained time and time again that the resolution applies only to the North Atlantic treaty. That is the first point. The second point is that we do not want the President of the United States to make any commitment to assign American boys to an international army in Europe until Congress has determined the policy. That is as plain as it can be. If the Senator is bothered about whether or not the Navy or the Marine Corps is included, and wants to clarify the point by amending the resolution in that respect, it is agreeable to me. However, the resolution in its present form does not affect the assignment of the Marine Corps or the Navy wherever the President may want to assign it, provided his action comes within his authority under the Constitution.

Mr. McFARLAND. Very well; the Senator has excepted the Marine Corps. I should like to ask one more more question.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I do not like to preclude the distinguished majority leader from asking any more questions, but I should like to proceed with my speech. I have been trying to make the speech since last Thursday. If I could make the speech I think it would answer probably 90 percent of all the questions which are being asked of me, because the questions which have been asked so far have convinced me that the resolution is not clearly understood.

Mr. McFARLAND. I agree that it is not understood. Therefore I should like to ask one more question.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. McFARLAND. The Senator has excepted the Air Force. Would it permit ground personnel of the Air Force to repair the airplanes which were sent to Europe? Could such ground forces be sent to Europe for that purpose?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, once again the Senator is expanding the theory which he is attempting to put forth on the basis of my use of the term "ground forces." He asks whether the term includes everything. If he wants to include everything in the resolution, it is all right with me, and I shall be glad to accept the modification.

Mr. McFARLAND. No.

Mr. WHERRY. If he wants to write in the name of General Eisenhower, it is agreeable to me.

Mr. McFARLAND. I want to know what the Senator wishes to do.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have answered the questions. If the Senator does not understand my answers to the questions he has asked, I regret it very much. The resolution strikes at the heart of the policy—and it is a new policy, completely outside the Constitution and completely outside the North Atlantic Treaty—as enunciated by the President when he claimed authority to commit American soldiers to an integrated army in Europe without first coming to Congress for a determination of such a policy.

If the Senator is worried about whether or not "ground forces" include Marines or any other branch of the service, he can offer an amendment to the resolution to define "ground forces." What the junior Senator from Nebraska is doing is submitting a resolution which is self-explanatory, and which says that the President should make no commitments on the basis of this great policy until the Congress of the United States makes the determination.

Mr. LEHMAN and Mr. KERR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield first to the Senator from New York, because he was first on his feet. Later I shall yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the minority leader has said that his resolution provides that it is the sense of the Senate that until there is a determination of policy by the Congress, the President should not, regardless of his constitutional rights, send any ground troops to Europe to implement the Atlantic Pact.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LEHMAN. The Senator has stated that Senators may vote aye or no.

Mr. WHERRY. That is true.

Mr. LEHMAN. Is it not a fact that we are rather familiar with filibusters in the Senate? In view of the provision of the resolution that no action should be taken by the President pending a determination by the Congress, would it not be possible for a small group of men in the Senate to filibuster and hold up action endlessly?

Mr. WHERRY. No.

Mr. LEHMAN. Action could be indefinitely postponed, thus rendering the Nation completely impotent, in my opinion.

Mr. WHERRY. While I admit that the filibuster, if it is used successfully, can hold up legislation, I am here to advise Members that a resolution coming from the Armed Services Committee or the Committee on Foreign Relations, or a program submitted by the President himself, would have the right-of-way in the determination of the policy with respect to what land forces should be sent. When such a resolution is brought forth by the appropriate committee, there is no further need for this resolution. All this resolution provides is that until the determination is made, until the program is submitted—until General Eisenhower, for example, may make his report—this question should be held in abeyance.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I will not yield further, unless the Senator wishes to ask a different question, which is not along the same line as previous questions.

Mr. LEHMAN. I was about to ask how, under the Wherry rule, it would be possible to shut off debate within any measurable time, even if there were only a small group of Senators who determined to invoke the filibuster.

Mr. WHERRY. I shall answer the Senator's question. I am familiar with the rules of the Senate. The minute a program comes to the Senate the question can be submitted, to determine whether or not land soldiers shall be sent over there. In the meantime, this resolution would provide that the question should be held in abeyance. I think it is fantastic to say that the Wherry resolution would be filibustered. We have agreed to vote on the resolution on Tuesday of next week. There will be no filibuster in connection with the Wherry resolution.

Mr. LEHMAN. I was not referring to the Wherry resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. If there were a filibuster on the Wherry resolution, there would be no difficulty about getting a vote on the question of determining the policy with respect to manpower, under a resolution to send ground forces to Europe.

Mr. LEHMAN. I was not referring to the Wherry resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. To what was the Senator referring?

Mr. LEHMAN. I was referring to the resolution under which the policy of the United States with regard to implementing the Atlantic Pact would be determined.

Mr. WHERRY. Regardless of the Wherry resolution, there would be debate on the floor of the Senate on that question. If a resolution is brought before the Senate, as is the intention, to implement the North Atlantic Treaty with ground forces, there will be debate just the same. The Wherry resolution has nothing to do with that situation.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I will; but this is the last time I am going to yield until I conclude my speech. The questions which are being asked are all answered in my speech. After I am through, I shall remain here all afternoon and answer any questions any Senator wishes to ask.

Mr. KERR. If I correctly understood the Senator a while ago, he said that after he had heard the questions being asked he was convinced that the resolution was not understood.

Mr. WHERRY. No; I said that it was misinterpreted, and possibly misunderstood.

Mr. KERR. I wonder by whom the Senator thought it was not understood.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is naive. I suppose that, in his eloquent way, he wishes to create the impression that the Senator from Nebraska does not know what he is doing.

Mr. KERR. No; I merely wished to ask a question.

Mr. WHERRY. If Senators will give me an out-and-out vote on this resolution, it will meet the approval of the people of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. We will give the Senator an "out" vote, but not an in-and-out vote.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the Senator's observation.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have the floor. I always respect seniority. However, these asides, these undercutting answers and responses which come from Senators who do not even address the Chair, show the limits to which some will go in an effort to defeat a resolution in which the American people are interested, even though the Senator from Texas is not interested. We shall see who is out and who is in, in the judgment of the American people.

Mr. President, I decline to yield further until I finish my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONRONEY in the chair). The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I shall begin at the beginning.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

The meaning of this resolution is plain. It neither approves nor disapproves the sending of United States ground forces to Atlantic treaty countries to become part of a peacetime international army.

Senators in voting for this resolution in no way commit themselves for or against the sending of American boys to Western Europe to become part of a peacetime army.

The only purpose of this resolution is to hold in abeyance the assignment of United States troops to Western Europe until the Congress, as the policy-making branch of the Government, acts upon the matter.

Senators may try to explain it away. They may say that it does not mean what it is said to mean. They may imply that it is misunderstood by the Senator who submits it. However, it is just as simple as that 2 and 2 make 4. Either the Congress is in favor of continuing its right under the North Atlantic Treaty to determine the policy, or it is willing to abdicate that right and give it to the President of the United States. I am not ready to do that, and I do not believe the American people want us to do it.

While this resolution seeks to hold in abeyance only the sending of ground forces for inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty army, the junior Senator from Nebraska points out that the President has no authority to implement the treaty in any way except as already authorized by the Congress.

Ground forces are cited in this resolution because to start assigning them to the international army would be a far-reaching departure from the policy of the Congress as provided in existing treaty implementation legislation. It is a completely new policy, outside the authority of the Constitution. It certainly is not provided for inside the North Atlantic Treaty.

It should also be pointed out that the resolution in no way seeks to restrict the authority of the President over movement of naval forces under established customs and practice.

As I attempted to explain to the distinguished majority leader, that is the reason why naval forces were not included in the resolution. If the majority leader wishes to include them, it is all right with me.

The issues raised in sending ground forces to Western Europe at this time are of supreme importance. Upon the determination of this question rests our entire national preparedness effort. It may be that our very destiny rests upon it.

It is a question of highest policy in national defense.

It is a question which vitally affects every man, woman, and child in our beloved country.

It is a question the answer to which will determine the whole global policy of the United States to meet the danger of armed Communist aggression.

It is a question to answer to which will determine how many young men shall be called to the colors, how large our governmental expenditures shall be, what the tax burden will be, and how far the United States shall go in becoming a regimented state.

All those questions are involved in the determination of a new policy, to commit a land army to Western Europe as a part of an integrated international army.

And it is a question which no one man, even though he be President, should have the right or power to answer and bind all our people to his decision.

The junior Senator from Nebraska confidently hoped that the President would discuss this paramount question in his recent message to the Congress on the state of the Union.

The junior Senator from Nebraska had noted, as other Members of this body, no doubt had noted, press dispatches reporting the President as saying he possesses full authority to send United States ground forces to Western Europe; and that he intends to do so. That statement was carried by the whole press. It went all over the country. Great headlines appeared over it.

This subject has become widely discussed among the people, and properly so, since it affects them vitally.

In view of the President's reported statements in press and radio conferences, and his silence on this paramount issue in his message on the state of the Union, the junior Senator from Nebraska felt compelled to offer his resolution. I did so within a few minutes after the Senate reconvened following the joint session of the Congress to hear the state-of-the-Union message delivered by the President.

Since the convening of the Eighty-second Congress foreign policy has been the major subject of debate in this Chamber.

It has been a wholesome, constructive debate. Every member of this body knows communism is a serious threat. We are united in our determination to do everything prudent to protect our own country and other freedom-loving countries.

There are differences over methods. These differing approaches are desirable, coming from many thinkers, from the people. Through debate and deliberation the wheat is sifted from the chaff. When the sound policy is distilled from the great debate now under way in the Congress there will be national unity and America will go forward recovering her lost leadership in the world.

Members of this body do not emulate that mythical judge who never listened to the other side of an argument because he did not want to be confused.

Mr. President, so there will be no confusion over the history of Senate Resolution No. 8, the Senate is reminded that on January 11, 1951, 3 days after the President delivered his state of the Union message and 3 days after the junior Senator from Nebraska submitted his resolution, the President held a news conference.

While that news conference was under way Members of the Senate were debating the issue of whether ground forces should be sent now to Western Europe to become a part of an integrated international army. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was addressing the Senate. In his remarks, which may be found on page 142 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Senator from Texas made this statement:

> As for the future, I am confident that the executive branch will consult with Congress on troop commitments to the integrated European defense force now being mobilized. Indeed, it is my understanding that administration leaders are not hostile to such an idea.

At this point the junior Senator from Nebraska rose and said:

> Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator from Texas for yielding. I ask this question in the light of his last observation. Does the Senator understand that no commitment has been made by the President to furnish foot soldiers for an integrated army in Europe, and that if and when such commitment is made, it will be brought to the Congress for consideration?

I think that is a very simple, a very intelligent, and a very timely question, and the American people want to know the answer to it.

The senior Senator from Texas replied:

> I do not think the Senator ought to ask that question, because that is a highly executive question. I really do not know, but I assume that there is some feeling that a commitment of that kind will be made, or we would not have General Eisenhower in Europe now.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I just stated that I cannot yield. I regret very much, but I cannot yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. I said to a Senator on the other side a moment ago that I wanted to proceed to deliver the speech uninterrupted. I have stated that I would not yield, in answer to a request from a Senator on the other side, so I must say to the Senator from Wisconsin I cannot yield to him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wanted to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he would yield so I might suggest the absence——

Mr. WHERRY. I will not yield for any purpose to the Senator from Wisconsin, because I stated a moment ago to a Senator on the other side that I would not yield any further.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Senator yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. WHERRY. No, Mr. President. A quorum call was had before I began speaking. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] walked out when I asked him not to question me until after I had concluded my speech. If he wants to remain away until I have concluded my observations that is his privilege. I wish he were present. I wish other Senators were present. But after a quorum call had been had I began to speak, and I will continue to speak. I hope Senators will read my speech in the RECORD. I shall continue with the speech now, because I have tried since last Thursday to explain my resolution. I say it is completely misunderstood by some who can read the English language and it is misinterpreted by many.

Mr. President, thus, the senior Senator from Texas, as recently as January 11, told the Senate he did not know whether the President had made a commitment to foreign governments that American boys would be sent to their countries to join an international army. But the senior Senator from Texas said he assumed that there is a feeling such a commitment will be made, and that Congress would be consulted on it.

Earlier on the same day, January 11, and before the President began his news conference, the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], the majority leader, in an estimable appeal to the Senate for unity and patriotic devotion to duty, advised us not to become excited about the matter of sending American boys to western Europe at this time.

The majority leader stated, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 11, on page 140:

> General Eisenhower has gone to Europe to learn the facts, to make the evaluation. He is expected to return to this country sometime next month with those facts. Is it wise for us to make statements here which would make his great task more difficult? Is it prudent to prejudge the facts he will assemble? Is it sensible to proclaim judgments and assert positions which we may find untenable or improvident later?

All of us know his report will be complete, honest, and forthright. All of us know that he will call a spade a spade—

He was talking about General Eisenhower—that there will be no varnish, no double meanings, no evasions in what he tells us. It may be that his report will make meaningless much of what some of us would say now. In any event, it seems to me that prudence and plain common sense would dictate that we ought to know more and, meanwhile, talk less.

Mr. President, the last observation about knowing more and talking less is always good advice.

The sound advice of the distinguished majority leader applies forcefully to Senate Resolution No. 8, because the sole purpose of the resolution is to hold in abeyance the sending of foot soldiers to Western Europe at this time, until the Congress knows more about the implications of such action and can assert its prerogative as the policy-making department of the Government.

While all this was being said on the floor of the Senate, the President, at his simultaneous news conference, left no doubt that he believes the President has absolute control over the Armed Forces of the United States and can assign them to any place on earth, in peace or war, and for any purpose he deems wise.

He, the President, told the press and radio there are a hundred precedents sustaining his asserted right to draft American boys, and order them to Western Europe to become part of an international army to carry out the purposes of the Atlantic defense treaty.

Members of this body no doubt have read the newspaper reports of the President's January 11 news conference. And Members of this body, no doubt, have heard over and over on the radio the reported assertion by the President, that the Chief Executive has full authority to assign American boys to an international army for the purpose of carrying out provisions of the Atlantic defense treaty.

Again and again, times without number, the statement has been drummed into the ears of the American people that the President has full power to send American troops anywhere and for any purpose he considers in the interests of the United States.

This headline appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of January 12, 1951:

Truman will consult Congress on troops, then act on his own.

Insists he has full power to send GI's to Europe; accepts challenge, ready to go to people.

The story in the Herald Tribune, under the byline of James E. Warner, and dated January 11, says:

President Truman declared today he will consult with Congress before sending American troops to Europe, but made it clear he will not seek congressional permission to do so.

At a news conference held as the Senate proceeded with a debate on the issue, the President said that, as Commander in Chief, he does not have to seek congressional approval to send troops abroad.

With vigor he accepted the challenge of those in Congress who would seek to exercise control over such troop commitments by tying up military appropriation. If they want to go to the country on that, Mr. Truman said, he would go with them.

He added that he had gone to the country once before and licked his congressional critics.

There is no question, Mr. Truman said, about the authority of the President to send troops anywhere in the world. This authority has been made abundantly clear throughout the history of the United States.

But, he said, this Government always consults with proper congressional committees, such as the Foreign Relations and Armed Services groups, on foreign-policy decisions.

The Baltimore Sun for January 12, 1951, carried a story by Dewey L. Fleming, and dated January 11. It says:

President Truman intends to consult Congress on the question of sending American troops to Europe, but he does not feel he is obliged to get Congress' permission to do so, he declared.

He is convinced that he has a clear authority to assign American Armed Forces to any place in the world where he believes they are needed to insure the security of this country, and he regards consultation with the legislative branch as an act of courtesy rather than a legal requirement.

Further on the Baltimore Sun story says:

The reporter remarked that in a Senate speech this afternoon Senator CONNALLY, Democrat, Texas, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, had said the President would consult Congress on the current dispute over sending troops to Europe to participate in the combined defense force which is to be established and commanded by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The President said that was correct; he did intend to consult Congress; but again he remarked that did not mean that he had to abide by congressional wishes in the matter.

"And you do expect to send more troops to Europe?" a reporter asked.

"Certainly," said the President, adding that he saw no point in going to all of the trouble of making the Atlantic Treaty arrangements and sending General Eisenhower over to take charge of Western European defense unless we meant to go through with the project.

Mr. President, the Baltimore Sun story, as well as reports in other newspapers, explained that by consulting Congress the President meant consultation between Secretary of State Acheson, General Marshall, other administration officials, and members of the congressional Committees on Foreign Affairs and the Armed Services.

The President wanted it understood that he did not mean consultation with Congress as such, through official submission of his plans to the Congress as a whole for its official consideration and action, but only what the President described as consultation with committee members.

The junior Senator from Nebraska has a high regard for the members of the Committees on Foreign Relations and Armed Services. The members of these committees would quickly disavow any authority to speak for the Senate as a whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary also has an important interest in this matter, because questions involving the constitutional powers of the Congress and the Chief Executive are involved, and may become more frequent as we move into consideration of the Communists' international conspiracy on a global scale.

It is not the prerogative of the junior Senator from Nebraska to speak for the Democratic membership of the Senate; but the President seems to have overlooked the fact that no one among the Republican Members of this body has the right to make commitments for the Republican Members until they have given authorization to do so; and the Republican Members of the Senate are most unlikely to give any of their Members free rein to commit them on important matters of public policy.

The 47 Republican Members alone of the minority can determine party policy in the Senate. No individual Member has that authority.

It will be recalled that the Republican Members of the Senate in the Eighty-first Congress, in a meeting last month, adopted a resolution pleading wholehearted cooperation with the administration in the development of foreign policies provided the term "consultation" was accepted as a two-way street.

Consultation does not mean mere transmittal of information after the administration has reached a decision such as the President has reached in the matter of sending American boys to Western Europe to join an international peacetime army.

Mr. President, at this critical time when there is a great urgency for comity and patriotic cooperation between the executive and legislative branches, it is very unfortunate that President Truman creates a serious friction point by contending he has full power to decide what the national-defense policy of the United States shall be, and by bluntly serving notice that, if Congress does not provide the funds for expenses, he will go to the people.

The junior Senator from Nebraska would not shrink from such a contest before the people, for the junior Senator from Nebraska is quite confident of what the verdict of the grand jury of the people would be on this issue.

The junior Senator from Nebraska is hopeful that the President, in the interest of national unity, and to spare our country a needless stalemate at the very inception of the great push for national preparedness, will reexamine his position and submit his plans to Congress for its approval.

Once again I wish to renew my suggestion to the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that if he is informed, or if he will visit the White House and there gain the information, that the President will not commit or assign American boys to an international army for purposes of the North Atlantic Pact, until the Congress determines that policy, I will withdraw the resolution, for the purposes of the resolution will then have been served. That is all that is in the resolution.

The junior Senator from Nebraska will wholeheartedly abide by the action of the Congress, always retaining his right to seek correction in the light of experience.

The solid truth is that there is no constitutional authority and no precedent to support the President's announcement that he is going to send United States Armed Forces to North Atlantic Treaty countries to be integrated into a North Atlantic Treaty army.

The solid truth is there is no authority in the North Atlantic Treaty for the President alone to decide the character of aid the United States shall furnish under the provisions of the treaty.

Plainly, the President is seeking to implement the North Atlantic Treaty by indirection, under assumed authority of the Constitution, which he cannot do alone under the North Atlantic Treaty. Mr. President, that is sheer usurpation of congressional power by the President.

The American people want no more Yaltas, Tehrans, and Potsdams; no more back-room secret agreements sealing the fate of themselves and their children.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ARGUMENT

Down through the years, constitutional lawyers have argued and debated the authority that the President has under the Constitution to use the Armed Forces of the United States around the world.

The one thing, it seems to me, that has to be decided, in determining the extent of that constitutional authority, is what the President orders the United States troops to do.

If their assignment is merely to protect, in local actions, the person and property of our nationals, that is one thing.

If their assignment could be construed as an act which could involve this country in another world war, that is another.

This question was brought up and thoroughly debated when Senate bill 1580 was presented to the Senate in the Seventy-ninth Congress, and it would be well for all of us to refresh our memories as to what happened in that historic debate with reference to the furnishing by the United States of troops to carry out the mandate of the Security Council.

That debate on the floor of the Senate relative to the so-called constitutional authority of the President to send our troops abroad resulted in the passage of Public Law 264. Section 6 of that law provides as follows:

The President is authorized to negotiate a special agreement or agreements with the Security Council which shall be subject to the approval of the Congress—

I stress that provision and call it to the especial attention of all Members of the Senate—by appropriate act or joint resolution, providing for the numbers and types of armed forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of facilities and assistance, including rights of passage, to be made available to the Security Council on its call for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security in accordance with article 43 of said Charter. The President shall not be deemed to require the authorization of the Congress to make available to the Security Council on its call in order to take action under article 42 of said Charter and pursuant to such special agreement or agreements the armed forces, facilities, or assistance provided for therein: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as an authorization to the President by the Congress to make available to the Security Council for such purpose armed forces, facilities, or assistance in addition to the forces, facilities, and assistance provided for in such special agreement or agreements.

That is section 6 of Public Law 264, which was enacted as the result of extended debate on the floor of the Senate relative to the so-called constitutional authority of the President to send American troops around the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to yield a little later.

I may point out, however, that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations had much to do with the enactment of section 6 of Public Law 264. For the information of every Member of the Senate, I desire to call attention to certain observations which were made in that report by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. In discussing section 6, the report reveals that—

Among such obligations is that of supplying armed forces to the Security Council concerning which provision is made in section 6.

Although the ratification of the Charter resulted in the vesting in the executive branch of the power and obligation to fulfill the commitments assumed by the United States thereunder, the Congress must be taken into close partnership and must be fully advised of all phases of our participation in this enterprise. The Congress will be asked annually to appropriate funds to support the United Nations budget and for the expenses of our representation. It will be called upon to approve arrangements for the supply of armed forces to the Security Council and thereafter to make appropriations for the maintenance of such forces.

Another quotation from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations reads:

The first part of section 6 would authorize the President to negotiate a military agreement or agreements with the Security Council for the purposes and within the limits prescribed by article 43 of the Charter. While in constitutional terms, the prior authorization of Congress is not needed to enable the President to negotiate an international agreement—particularly when such an agreement is necessary in order to give effect to existing treaty obligations—the committee believed it desirable that on a matter of this scope and importance the Congress should record its views in advance. In this way the President may proceed with full assurance that the Congress as a whole desires an agreement to be entered into on this subject. At the same time the bill, providing that the Congress shall approve any such agreement or agreements as may be negotiated, insures that the Congress will have full opportunity to pass upon the terms and provisions thereof.

Quoting further from the report of the Foreign Relations Committee, submitted to the Senate during the consideration of Senate bill 1580, the distinguished chairman said:

On the last day of the debate in the Senate, July 28, the President, then attending the Potsdam Conference, sent a message to the Congress in which he stated that "When any such agreement or agreements are negotiated, it will be my purpose to ask the Congress by appropriate legislation to approve them." The committee believes that it is desirable to determine this question once and for all, and that it is appropriate to specify that the military agreement or agreements should be submitted for approval to the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask, What did the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee mean when he said the "committee believes that it is desirable to determine this question once and for all"?

The question constantly asked by constitutional lawyers was whether the President had the constitutional authority to send troops to carry out the mandate of the United Nations without the approval of Congress. That is exactly the question involved in this debate today. Does the President, under the Constitution, have the right to commit American boys to service in an integrated international army without first coming to the Congress of the United States for its determination?

If the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee then decided that, once and for all, it was necessary that the Congress give its approval of the agreements negotiated by the President, it is just as necessary today, in the consideration of the sending of troops to this international army, that the Congress have the right to determine that policy.

As the chairman said, a full-fledged partnership with the President is necessary in the making of such a high policy as the one which now confronts the Senate.

We all know what has happened in Korea. Without prior approval of Congress, the President committed large ground forces of the United States on the theory that the action was a mere police action, only to find that by so doing he has brought about an actual state of war, even though undeclared, between the Chinese Communist government and the United States, which, if carried to its logical conclusion, will mean bringing to bear on the Chinese Communist government all of the power of the Armed Forces of the United States.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law 264 and the solemn commitments given to the Senator from Texas, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by the President in his message from Potsdam, as set forth in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the President has never submitted to the Congress, and secured its approval, the question of the use of American military and naval forces, or as to the elements thereof which are to be available for use to the United Nations Security Council.

Congress was thus met in the Korean situation by a fait accompli. What else could the Congress do but go along with the Presidential action. Thousands of American boys had been sent into action. Our casualty list was high and growing. A similar situation will face us if the President commits ground forces to continental Europe without the consent of Congress.

It is to avoid such another fait accompli, without first having full congressional debate as to the desirability of sending large ground troops to Europe, that the resolution submitted by me is directed.

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The President's announced course is in direct conflict with the procedures prescribed in the North Atlantic Treaty. The legal, orderly course is to adhere to the procedures defined in the treaty. If the President alone decides what the character of mutual aid and self-help is to be, then the procedures set forth in the treaty become useless, and Congress becomes a rubber stamp to finance the President's commitments.

Before any real damage has been done, and before foot soldiers are committed overseas, the President can prevent a calamitous situation—calamitous, that is, for national defense—by brushing aside his power-grabbing advisers and enlisting the eager will of the Congress and the people to support every worthy proposal he makes in the defense effort.

Mr. President, three articles in the treaty are relevant to this discussion, articles 3, 5, and 9. Article 9, which provides for a council which is to plan and recommend measures for implementation of the treaty, reads as follows:

The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in partfcular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

Article 3, which covers mutual aid and self-help in preparedness against possible war, reads as follows:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Article 5 covers mutual aid and self-help in the event of aggression against any party to the treaty:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Make no mistake about it. Weigh carefully the situation that now confronts us. All the procedure for implementing the North Atlantic Treaty, so far as the United States is concerned, becomes a dead letter if the President carries out his announced decision to send foot soldiers to Western Europe, thereby alone setting the pattern for mutual aid.

Senators who participated in the debate on ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty will recall the assurances that were given by proponents of the treaty, among them that under it the Congress retained complete discretionary authority over what character of aid the United States would furnish other parties to the treaty.

This assurance was given to the Senate by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on July 21, 1949, when the treaty was being considered. It may be found in volume 95, part 8, page 9894, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The senior Senator from Texas, then as now, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, was discussing article 3, the part of the treaty that is operative before aggression against a party or parties to the treaty, the situation which prevails today.

This is what the distinguished and able senior Senator from Texas said:

But it is said that under article 3 we are obligated to furnish arms. Mr. President, we are not specifically obligated to furnish anything. There is nothing in the treaty that says we shall give them tanks or bombs or arms. * * *

In other words, after the treaty has been ratified, if the other nations request arms and point out their reasons and their situation and their inability to provide themselves with arms, then it would be for the people of the United States, through the Congress, to determine whether it was desirable or suitable, under article 3, to give or to furnish them arms.

Some feel sensitive about the matter of providing arms. Will not the Congress have to be the one to decide whether to provide them? Will not Senators who now are in the Senate Chamber be here then? Are Senators afraid to trust future Congresses? Do they wish to tie the hands of future Congresses and make a pronouncement that would embarrass a future Congress if it were to consider the matter of giving or withholding arms? I believe the Congress can be trusted. The Congress is being trusted now in connection with this treaty. Cannot we trust future Congresses in regard to the granting of arms?

On page 9896 of the RECORD for July 21, 1949, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee said:

The obligations are plainly set forth in the treaty, and to the Congress itself must be remitted the matter of whatever we furnish under article III or under other articles of the treaty. I am willing to trust the Congress. Congress is where the Constitution puts the responsibility, and that is where we shall put it.

Mr. President, that was a great statement by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. "Congress is where the Constitution puts the responsibility, and that is where we shall put it," he said.

Oh, that President Truman would listen to the advice of the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. The American people implore you, Mr. President Truman, to ponder well these words of the senior Senator from Texas—that Congress is where the Constitution puts the responsibility, and that is where it should be placed in determining this new policy.

Law and order must be preserved at all costs, for without law and order the freedoms of the people perish.

Listen to these words of the Secretary of State, in a letter to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on July 11, 1949. They will be found in the RECORD of that date, at page 9193:

Any further military-assistance program involving Atlantic Pact countries will be prepared and submitted to the Congress on the basis of recommendations which will be made by the organization to be established under article IX of the treaty.

What could be clearer than that? That was Secretary of State Dean Acheson speaking in July 1949.

Can it be that Mr. Acheson is now advising the President to bypass the Congress in this supreme matter of policy regarding assignment of American troops to spearhead a puny international army against possible attack by millions upon millions of well armed and equipped Russian ground soldiers supported by air power?

Is the present Secretary of State the chief architect of this ill-advised plan to consume America's manpower and resources in this vain project for defeat of Russia on the ground?

It was, back in 1949, he who promised the North Atlantic Treaty countries that the United States would arm them. That is what the leaders of the foreign governments said at that time.

Mr. President, is this to be the crowning failure, the mortal blow to our beloved Republic? I ask that question. I think it is a question which is on the lips of every man, woman, and child in America this afternoon.

The junior Senator from Nebraska is going to give his reasons why he did not support the North Atlantic Pact. It is not a question at issue under the resolution at all. I have attempted to limit the resolution to the commitment of troops prior to the time Congress shall determine the policy, but in view of the fact that so much has been said about what I favor and what someone else favors, I shall bring to the attention of the Senate many observations in speeches which I have made and which I hope will be helpful, at least, in giving my position on the question, although I think the decision should be made when the recommendations come to the Senate in a resolution from the committee, or from the President of the United States, or when General Eisenhower returns.

The junior Senator from Nebraska voted against ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty because the showing of proponents of the pact was that they were depending upon the establishment of ground forces in Western Europe adequate to defeat Russia if she attacked.

Mr. President, I contended that the exclusion of Spain and Western Germany from the defense pact made doubly sure that it was a futile gesture. I pleaded time and time again for the inclusion of Spain as a member of the North Atlantic Pact. For 5 years, as Senators will remember, I asked that Spain be armed. If Spain and Western Germany had been included in the defense pact, the situation today might be different.

As Members of this body well know, the junior Senator from Nebraska many times and for many months urged that there be an end to the stupid, revengeful Morgenthau plan for the destruction of Western Germany's industrial plants. Resolution after resolution was introduced. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. They never came out of the committee. They should have been given consideration.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, now, when we need the steel potential of the Ruhr, the plants are gone. Many of the plants have been shipped to Russia. If we had that steel potential today we would be in a much better position, and it would not take the money of the taxpayers of the United States to rebuild the Ruhr in order to get the steel potential.

For many months the junior Senator from Nebraska urged that Spain be recognized.

At long last, and as the failures in foreign policy have resulted in the present critical threat of Communist imperialism, we have completed a circle of administration policies toward Western Germany and Spain. Now we ask both to help arm against possible Russian attack.

At the end of the war a forthright American policy toward Western Germany, after the manner of Abraham Lincoln's admonition, "with malice toward none," and "bind the wounds," would have averted much of the difficulty we face today.

In discussing the North Atlantic Treaty on the floor of the Senate July 21, 1949, the junior Senator from Nebraska said:

> Now, I want to make my position clear on article 5 of the treaty. It is the heart of the treaty. In effect it is a multilateral assumption by the parties to the treaty to the principles of the Monroe Doctrine.
> I am in favor of extending the principles of the Monroe Doctrine to all of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. I take this position with a full understanding of the heavy responsibilities involved. * * *
> I am willing to extend the principles of the Monroe Doctrine, because America has been in two world wars which America did not start. Certainly these experiences have proven that when the conflagration of war starts in Europe, America inevitably is drawn in. If we are going to be in all the crash landings, we ought to be in a position to help prevent the take-offs.

Let no one, now or ever, in Europe or Russia, think for one moment that the United States will welsh on her commitments in the North Atlantic Treaty.

If Russia or any of her captive countries launch war upon any of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, the United States will be swift to aid in subduing the aggressor. But the character of our aid must be determined by the American people, through their representatives in Congress.

Obviously, prudence dictates that there must be preparedness against possible attack.

In the debate on ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty, the junior Senator from Nebraska took the position that our best insurance against war with Russia and for victory, if war should come, is a superior hard-hitting Air Force and an invincible Navy. We must have mastery of the air, and we must be invincible on the seas.

The junior Senator from Nebraska failed to stir a ripple of support in the Senate at that time for an air-sea defense tailored to the peculiarities of a war with Russia. He was called an isolationist, an ostrich. It was charged that he wanted to pull the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans around him and let the rest of the world go by.

But, with the passing of time and a more general appreciation of the magnitude of the problem of containing Russia, more are seeing that air power, supported by the Army and Navy, must spearhead any war with Russia, and that to major in a ground war is simply playing Russia's game.

Remember that back in 1924 Lenin, while Russian dictator, said:

> Someday we shall force the United States to spend itself into destruction.

After hearing the figures which were presented by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], Americans should wake up and think about the prophecy of Lenin. I am not certain that the figures quoted by the Senator from Illinois were correct. They are different from the figures which I studied as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. However, when we are faced with an annual budget of $100,000,000,000, it is time for Americans to wake up and decide whether the prophecy of Lenin might not come true. This terrible prophecy will come true if we attempt to put a ring of bayonets around Russia.

A second-rate army in numbers and in fire power, in Europe or in the oil-rich Middle East, straddling the Suez Canal, jugular vein of the free world east and west, is worse than none at all. It is worse because it digs the graves for countless thousands, perhaps millions, of dead.

I implore Members of this body, in whose hands now rests the fate of the Republic, and, indeed, the free world—yes, the yearning for liberty by the people of Russia themselves—to consider the realities, and not be bogged down by the Maginot line hypnosis which proved France's undoing in the last war.

Before us in Korea we have an immediate object lesson. We are hopelessly outnumbered, and we are compelled to take appalling losses. But these Korean losses are almost negligible compared to what we would suffer if our ground forces received the full weight of the Red army in Europe.

Be prepared for verbal brickbats from those who see overwhelming, invincible land armies spread over the free world, where there is none at all and no visible prospect of there ever being one to take Moscow until and unless Russia's war-making power is pulverized by air power.

The junior Senator from Nebraska is accustomed to the smears of the unwitting stooges of the Communists. The junior Senator from Nebraska for years has opposed the New Deal lock, stock, and barrel, on the solid ground that preservation of the American heritage, the never, never-dying principles of our Republic, is mandatory.

Mr. President, the observations made by the junior Senator from Nebraska on the Senate floor on September 28, 1949, when the bill to arm North Atlantic Treaty countries was being considered, are of equal force today. This is what he said:

> The bill to arm Atlantic Treaty countries, now in its final stage of passage by Congress, sets the pattern for rearming treaty nations.
> It is the wrong approach, because it emphasizes establishment of huge ground forces in Western Europe, when the main emphasis should be put on air power and naval power.
> It is the wrong approach, because it will drain American taxpayers of billions upon billions of dollars in a wasteful, ineffective policy. I think it could not be worse if it had been planned in Russia.
> The policy of making Western Europe an armed camp, at the expense of the American taxpayers fits the propaganda line of the Kremlin.
> The Kremlin is using the rearming of Western Europe to scare the Russian people and make them supple to the will of the dictators.
> Through fear propaganda they hold the freedom-loving Russian people in the dictator's grip.
> If the United States bends its efforts to prepare for a ground war with Russia, should the latter attack any or all the Atlantic Treaty countries, it will mean the loss of a generation of American boys on European soil.
> Figures of the last war support these views. When World War II ended there were 63 American divisions on the western front.

I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that at the height of World War II we had 63 divisions on the western front.

> American forces were assisted by 12 British, 5 Canadian, and 11 French divisions. The total was 91.
> With the German air force destroyed, our forces were driving the German ground forces back to Germany. On the eastern front, however, the Russians were pushing Hitler's legions westward with 502 divisions.
> This allied effort in the west was our maximum effort for World War II—91 divisions. But the 502 divisions of the Red army did not represent Russia's maximum strength, for Russia had already lost about 10,000,000 Red soldiers in absorbing the shock of the Nazi army.
> Military observers believe that in the next war—God forbid it shall ever come—Stalin could launch an attack against Europe with 1,000 divisions.

I do not know what he could do, and I doubt that anyone else knows.

> Thus the Allied ground forces would be outnumbered 10 or 20 to 1.

Anyone is free to choose his own figures.

The numerical inferiority in ground forces is not the only danger in the administration's military-assistance program. Russia is believed to have about 16,000 combat aircraft. The cost of building an Allied tactical air force able to neutralize Stalin's 16,000-plane tactical striking force is staggering. * * *

The futility of the military-assistance bill, with its emphasis upon ground forces, must be apparent to anyone in the light of the announcement by President Truman that Russia has achieved an atomic explosion. Obviously, this required a realistic approach to the entire defense policy.

In modern lightninglike warfare, in which planes can be flown over the North Pole and nonstop halfway around the world, America must allocate ample funds for the technical development of defensive measures, such as a radar screen to detect oncoming planes, and intelligence agencies to ascertain the potential enemy's planes.

Advocates of the pending military-assistance bill constantly harp on the argument that Western Europe would feel the first shock of war, if it comes.

The first shock—and possibly the decisive shock—might be the United States, with our National Capital, New York, Boston, Hartford, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Chicago, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Houston, or even New Orleans receiving the first bombs from Russian planes.

Argument that only a suicide plane could get through to bomb America is shallow. America must be prepared even against suicide planes.

That was said on the floor of the Senate back in 1949. Is it not about time we should proceed to make our own homeland impregnable, and then do what we can to help other freedom-loving peoples?

How long, Mr. President, do you suppose America can escape becoming a garrison state when annual expenditures are running at the rate of a hundred billion dollars?

Is it not about time for us to look before we leap to make sure we all leap together?

Continuing my remarks to the Senate back in September 1949:

The true war deterrent today is the long-range bomber. The American taxpayer's sound, sensible choice is to buy this essential security.

America must also maintain an effective Army and Navy, in order to have suitable bases, supplied and secure from which air and naval attack can be unleashed.

These bases cannot be counted upon if all are in Western Europe, though it would be wise to junk the administration's present fatuous policy toward Spain and open the way for establishment of air bases in Spain.

Spain is anti-Communist. Unlike France, Spain is not infested by hundreds of thousans of Communists, who stand ready to sabotage any preparedness or war effort that might be made.

Bases must be so located that they will have the incidental protection of water or mountains or deserts, or combinations of these natural barriers. Bases so located would not be subject to the full weight of an attack by the Red army. They could be defended.

Any policy to contain Russia within her borders must consider her as an entity, a solid mass of territory and population.

A chain of mutually supported air bases in England, Africa, Alaska, Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines would enable us to launch air strikes against any target in Eurasia.

For the most part these bases are already built. The cost of maintaining them and keeping them up to battle strength is not great, compared to the tremendous appropriations needed for the pending legislation.

America needs a navy to supply these bases, and to help defend them, and America needs an army to defend them from airborne and triphibious attack.

America needs allies to help defend these bases.

America needs plans for allied air and naval power and ground forces to be integrated with our forces in collective defense.

But America should never engage the Red army in Europe, or on her home ground, until our air power has pulverized the source of the Red army's strength.

Destroy Russia's railway bridges, and she cannot distribute food to feed her population, nor can she deliver coal to keep her people warm.

Destroy all her oil fields, refineries, and munitions plants—the lifeblood of modern war—and Russia is gone.

With her population hungry and cold, with the lifeblood and sinews of modern war, we can punish Russia into submission by bombing.

Napoleon tried to whip Russia with ground forces. He failed.

Hitler tried it. He failed.

Russia's vastness, her dependable ally of extreme winters, and her reckless disregard for human life, Russia's own people, make the ground approach tragic.

There is still another weapon in our arsenal to prevent another war; a weapon that is rusty but still available, and it is more powerful than all other weapons combined.

That is our convincing psychological weapon—truth.

Tell the Russian people, who do not want war as people everywhere do not want war, the wonders that have been accomplished by our American Republic for the prosperity, happiness, and contentment of our people.

Assure the Russian people, to whom the truth has been denied, that these blessings will flow to them if they have a liberal government that believes the people should be the masters of their government and not its slaves.

Mr. President, there is more, much more, to that address delivered in 1949. But there are several other arguments being made by those who have their eyes fixed upon the rubble and dust of the ground for guidance, instead of on the stars, upon which the junior Senator from Nebraska desires to comment.

President Truman dwelt upon one of these arguments in his recent state of the Union message, and it is being drummed into the ears of the American people around the clock through the press and radio.

The industrial resources of Western Europe and her fountains of culture are emphasized to support the ground army approach.

The President said:

If Western Europe were to fall to Soviet Russia, it would double the Soviet supply of coal and triple the Soviet supply of steel. If the free countries of Asia and Africa should fall to Soviet Russia, we would lose the sources of many of our most vital raw materials, including uranium, which is the basis of our atomic power. And Soviet command of the manpower of the free nations of Europe and Asia would confront us with military forces which we could never hope to equal.

Mr. President, this statement by President Truman, of course, is true, but our chances for keeping them in the free world without a ring of air bases around Russia with complete mastery of the air, are exactly zero.

If war comes, we could not stop Russia from invading Western Europe, but we could make the Russian horde powerless, because it would not get any more bread or bullets out of Russia. The Russian armies would have to survive off the country, and it would disintegrate.

There is nothing unique about trading space while getting in knock-out punches by air and sea. It is not pleasant to contemplate Europeans taking another occupation, temporary though it be, but there will be many more Europeans left, and more of their industries still standing, in that circumstance, than if we wage ground war, with another inferno of guns and tanks and bombs consuming Europe. It is a case of the lesser of two evils.

We cannot make every spot in the free world secure against capture by the Russian Army, and therefore, even though some may be temporarily occupied by the enemy; we must choose our spots for attack upon Russia, if Russia starts a war.

We simply cannot make every country on the perimeter of Russia impregnable against capture in the event of war. If we tried to do that we would bankrupt our country and fritter away our manpower, so that we would not be strong anywhere.

Spain is defensible. The Pyrenees Mountains, which comprise Spain's border, could be made impregnable against Russian hordes, even as Switzerland has maintained her independence amid the swirling wars over the centuries. Spain should be considered as one starting place for taking Moscow, after Russia's war power to fight has been demolished by air and sea power. And Spain will fight the Communists if they attack.

We must raise our sights in air power much beyond the administration's blueprints for 50,000 war planes; if and when they are needed.

America should have 100,000 war planes, with an ample supply of the best strategic bombers, and impregnable air bases around the world as quickly as they can be built; that is, planes in being and bases in being and on the alert, to spearhead a sound defense policy.

Joe Stalin knows that the atomic bomb is our best weapon. He knows that his best chance to win is on the ground.

Our best weapon, the best aid we can give to Europe and the oil-rich Middle East, with its Suez Canal, is mastery of the air and seas, so that we can deliver the atomic bomb.

Europeans may not see maneuvers and parades of an inferior land army, but they will have the comfort of knowing that poised and ready to strike Russia on her home ground are planes from a noose around Russia.

Mr. President, before concluding my remarks, there are a few grim questions the advocates of massive, bankrupting land armies that will rob our schools and colleges of youths must answer.

Before American boys are sent to Europe to become part of a land army, these questions must be answered to the American people. They must be answered in the realm of realism, not the realm of dreams.

Our Joint Chiefs of Staff should answer:

First. Is it proposed that we undertake a land war with the Communist-controlled horde, with its 300 combat divisions, its 30,000 tanks, and its more than 16,000 planes and unlimited resources in manpower in Russia and China?

Second. Can the Allied armies get to Moscow and produce a military victory out of which communism can be destroyed and peace brought to the world?

Third. Is the land army approach accepting Stalin's own battlefield where his strength is overwhelming?

Fourth. How many American divisions do you propose now to send to Western Europe?

Fifth. And how many American divisions will have to follow if we adopt this course and war comes?

Sixth. Will these American divisions sit on the defense line for years?

Seventh. If you plan to send 10 American divisions, how much sea-transport tonnage must be employed to serve them? Suppose it develops into 50 divisions, and over 2,500,000 men. How much tonnage is necessary?

Eighth. Why have you failed to develop a hard-hitting ring of air bases around Russia and put most of your eggs in the land-army basket?

Here are some questions the administration should answer to the American people:

First. How much is the peacetime land operation going to cost every year? First, as to 10 divisions, and, second, if we have to send 50 divisions or more?

Second. What will be the economic strain upon the American people?

Third. What commitments were made at Brussels?

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, all Senators, I am sure, are agreed that wholesome respect for the dignity, the rights, and the responsibilities of the executive and legislative branches is proper at all times, and especially during a national emergency. With that in mind we can get on with the great work ahead.

All my observations about a land-army approach, rather than our becoming masters of the air and invincible on the seas, are raised to suggest that before our country is committed on high policy different approaches should be debated and considered upon the floor of the Senate.

Whether Senators agree with the land-army approach or believe that war with the potential enemy makes mandatory the building of a ring of air bases around her, together with an invincible navy, it all should come to the attention of the Senate.

The conclusion of the Congress upon fundamental, over-all defense planning should be arrived at through open debate and in response to the will of the people.

That is the sole purpose of the resolution. And, as I said in the beginning, this resolution should be supported by every Member of the Senate, because the Congress does have the responsibility and duty to establish matters of high national policy, such as sending troops outside the country, when our country has not been attacked, and for purposes spelled out in the North Atlantic Treaty.

Certainly land troops are not made mandatory by the North Atlantic Treaty.

Some Senators may believe that the President has full power to send United States troops wherever he chooses, and for any purpose he chooses.

Some Senators may believe that all the Congress has to do is appropriate whatever money the President asks to implement the North Atlantic Treaty as he chooses.

Senators have a right to that opinion. I do not subscribe to that view. I do not believe the American people want it done that way.

I subscribe wholeheartedly to the views expressed by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], as expressed in the Washington Star of last Saturday. The Senator from Georgia brings to the question profound wisdom gathered over many years as a highly respected Member of this body. He is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He has been chairman of that committee, and is now chairman of the great Committee on Finance.

This is what the Senator from Georgia said:

> Regardless of whether the President has the power to commit American troops to combat in foreign areas without the consent of Congress, we will not obtain national unity that is essential in these times until the President advises the people that he will submit the question to Congress before finally acting.

The Senator from Georgia said he did not mean consultation with a few Members of the Congress, but presentation of his plan to the Congress. He said:

> Basically, the people feel that for the President to commit our forces without approval of Congress is not in keeping with the American tradition.
> The people have a right to be heard through their representatives in Congress. This would be a real bipartisan spirit in the handling of international affairs.

Mr. President, to me that is sound Americanism. The meaning of this resolution is crystal clear. At most it is an expression of opinion by the Senate that United States foot soldiers should not be sent to Western Europe for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending adoption of a policy thereon by the Congress.

This does not mean interminable delay, because there will be new legislation to implement the treaty. General Eisenhower within a few days will return and report. His observations will be carefully considered by the Congress and the country, along with views expressed by others, for this is a national issue. That is the American way.

In the national interest, I urge the adoption of Senate Resolution 8.

Mr. President, I wish to say one thing more. If I have not prepared the resolution in such words or such phraseology as is acceptable to the Senate, I shall be glad to accept a modification of the resolution if only the one principle remains in it, namely, that prior to the time the Congress shall determine the policy, either when General Eisenhower returns, or when the Committee on Armed Services or the Committee on Foreign Relations has presented a resolution on the subject, or when the President presents one. The President shall hold in abeyance any commitments he says he has the right to make. That is all I want to do by the resolution. I will modify it to meet the terms or language which Senators may wish to have used. I want the RECORD to show that I am not partial to the phraseology of the resolution, and am not trying to use words which will not result in what is intended to be achieved. I simply want the Senate to go on record as saying that it is the sense of the Senate that whether the President has the constitutional authority he says he has, or does not have it, we want no commitments made until the Congress determines whether under the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty we shall furnish ground forces to an integrated army in Europe. I want the Senate to inform the President that we want no commitments made until the Congress determines the policy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask the eminent junior Senator from Nebraska what the practical procedure would be if his resolution were to be adopted? Am I to understand that until the Congress—meaning both Houses—specifically authorized the sending of ground forces to Europe, no troops would be sent? Is that the meaning of his resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes. I shall state the interpretation I should like to have placed on it. The Senator was not on the floor when I made the statement in respect to that point. If the Senator wants all military units included in the resolution, it is all right with me. I am not objecting to that. All I want to make sure of is that the President will not commit troops to become a part of an international army until the Congress determines the policy; that is all. I do not want the President to commit troops, either under provisions of the treaty, or by his constitutional authority, if he has it, until that policy is determined by Congress. I do not want him to exercise that authority, if he has it or if he does not have it, until the Congress makes that determination. The resolution probably will not need to be considered if the President within a few days submits a proposal, or if, when General Eisenhower returns, recommendations are made on the subject, because then a resolution will be presented, and if no commitments have been made in the meantime, the purpose of my resolution will have been accomplished. But I do not want commitments made by the President so that we will have a fait accompli, when all that is left is for the Congress to appropriate money under a policy declared by the President, for I think the Congress itself ought to be a full-fledged partner in determining that high-level policy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then the Senator would say that the President or Members of the Congress should submit a policy in the form of a resolution, and the resolution, I take it, would be referred to the respective committees of the House and of the Senate?

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly. If a resolution were presented to us which asked us to determine the policy, a resolution such as I undersand the Senator from Illinois would like to present, it would go to the appropriate legislative committee. The committee would have hearings on it. Probably action upon it would be held in abeyance until General Eisenhower's return. All I am asking is that the President hold in abeyance the making of any commitment prior to the time action is taken on my resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand. The Senator would have such a resolution referred to the appropriate committees that may be interested?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes. Certainly if a resolution were presented which dealt with the question of deciding whether we were to send ground forces to Europe, it would go to the proper legislative committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And the Senator would wish to have protracted hearings on the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. I certainly would.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So there would be quite a long period of time during which the committee or committees would be considering the matter?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes, and for the Senator's information—as I know what the Senator is about to say, for I can read his mind on that subject, and I know that he would suggest that my resolution should go to a committee—I will say that my resolution does not need to go to a committee to have hearings upon it. What would the hearings be? We would have the same thing all over again that we had in connection with the United Nations—the question, "Does the President have the constitutional authority to act or does he not? We have threshed that matter out once, and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee finally said, "We are going to settle this question once and for all. We believe the Congress should have the right to determine the provisions of section 6 of Public Law 264."

Mr. President, the same question is involved here. It is for the Members of the Senate to decide whether or not we are going to give the President that power. Hearings can be held from now until doomsday on that great constitutional problem, and we will have constitutional lawyers split bird seeds over phraseology and words, and come here with their conclusions, and we will not know any more when they get through than we did before they began, and the debate on the question of constitutional authority will continue.

Mr. President, whether the President has the authority to make commitments or not, I am asking that no commitments be made until the Congress determines whether or not under the provisions of the North Atlantic treaty, we shall furnish ground forces to an integrated army in Europe.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has been on his feet for some time, awaiting an opportunity to ask questions; therefore, I now yield to him.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether I correctly interpret his position in connection with the North Atlantic Pact. Article 3 of the North Atlantic Pact provides that—

> In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

In article 5 they "agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all."

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to wait a moment before he asks his question. Article 3 specifies the kind of aid which shall be furnished before an attack is made. That is what is involved in my resolution. If there is such an attack, we are bound, at the present time, to send our forces abroad and to protect all those countries. I am not arguing about that.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Very well; I think the Senator is explaining just what I have in mind to ask him. In the hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, it was brought out by Secretary of State Acheson, in answer to a specific question, that that did not mean sending men, but that it meant sending arms; and under the military-assistance pact we later authorized that to be done.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Do I correctly understand that the purpose of the Senator's resolution is simply that before there is an extension of our obligations under article 3—in other words, in addition to sending arms, to send land troops—Congress should state its decision with reference to that policy under article 3?

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In other words, the Senator from Nebraska states it as his opinion, does he not, that the President would then be extending the interpretation of article 3 as it was adopted by the Congress and as it was explained to the Congress by the administration?

Now the Senator says that all he wishes to have Congress do is to prevent the interpretation of that article from being extended without giving Congress a chance to pass upon the specific point of the sending of our land troops or air troops or Marines or any other of our forces. Is that correct?

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct, and I wish to compliment the Senator from Massachusetts, for he has stated exactly what my position is, and he has stated it in clearer terms than I can.

Heretofore I have referred to article 5 of the North Atlantic Pact, doing so at a time when the Senator from Massachusetts was not on the floor.

The resolution refers only to the extension of authority which the Secretary of State or whoever is formulating the policy is attempting to bring about.

When the North Atlantic Pact was under consideration in the Senate, we had the debate at that time on the question of the meaning of the various articles of the pact. That question was raised then. Of course, I cannot speak for the other Members of the Senate; but for myself I am satisfied that many Members of the Senate voted in support of the North Atlantic Pact because of the explanation that it referred to arms, but not to men. That was one of the explanations made of the pact.

I contend that the President does not have the right to make a new policy of sending American boys to become a part of an integrated international army, even though the Congress might later determine upon such a policy. I maintain that the President should not do so until the question comes before the Congress and until the Congress determines upon that policy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Do I correctly understand, then, that the Senator from Nebraska takes the position that his resolution is confined to article 3 of the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from Nebraska is not questioning, is he, the right of the President to send troops abroad, under his constitutional powers as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, in defense of the United States or when the security of the United States is involved?

Mr. WHERRY. No, sir. I did not make a constitutional argument, because, as I have said before, we could debate that from now until the end of the present session, and still not get anywhere with it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator's resolution does not mean that, does it?

Mr. WHERRY. It does not; the resolution does not relate to what shall be done following an attack.

I agree that when the Congress adopted article 5 of the North Atlantic Pact, it meant that we have to come to the assistance of those countries, to stop any aggressor. Article 5 means that we have to do more than send supplies; we have actually to stop the aggressor.

However, article 5 is not involved in my resolution.

My resolution refers to a determination of the kind of mutual aid we are to furnish under article 3 of the North Atlantic Pact, prior to an armed attack. Therefore, article 5 is entirely removed from the scope of the resolution.

When the North Atlantic Pact was before the Senate, I was opposed to having the pact ratified, because neither Spain nor Western Germany was included, and also because the approach which I thought should be taken was not taken. However, now that the North Atlantic Pact has been ratified, I would be the last Member of the United States Senate to welsh upon our coming to the aid of those countries, under the provisions of the North Atlantic Pact. In other words, if there is an attack abroad which comes under the provisions of article 5 of the pact, the authority is already given.

On the other hand, I am discussing the commitments made under article 3 of the pact, which specifically reserves to the Congress the right to determine the kind of mutual aid we are to give; and that involves the sending of land troops.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So the Senator from Nebraska interprets article 3, does he, to mean that the President, when he requested the adoption of that article, stated to the Congress, through the Secretary of State, that it meant arms, but not men; and the Senator believes, does he, that if the President now wishes to change that interpretation, as it was given to the Foreign Relations Committee, and thus to the Senate, that question should again be considered in committee and debated on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. WHERRY. Certainly, prior to the time when the Congress determines upon such a policy.

If a resolution to that effect comes to the floor of the Senate from the Armed Services Committee, after hearings, and upon the recommendation of General Eisenhower or of the President himself, then we shall have an opportunity on the floor of the Senate to debate the very issue about which I am talking.

All my resolution provides is that before the time arrives, before that determination is made, the President shall not commit us to provide manpower, because he does not have authority to do so under the North Atlantic Treaty. I have narrowed the resolution until it relates only to providing American troops under the North Atlantic Pact. The resolution involves only that much.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If in the meantime, before that question was debated in committee and on the floor of the Senate, upon another request, let us say, by the President or upon a resolution introduced by a Member of Congress, if the security of the United States became involved in Europe, then, regardless of the North Atlantic Pact, or if the security of the United States became involved in any other section of the world, it would be the Senator's interpretation, would it, that the President, acting under his constitutional authority, could send our troops abroad?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that is a double-barrel question. Let me first answer the first part of the Senator's question as follows: Under the North Atlantic Pact, if any one of those countries is attacked, we are committed to go to its aid. So that is settled.

Now let me answer the second part of the Senator's question: The President does have constitutional authority to send our troops anywhere in the world, but it depends upon what the purpose of sending them is. I do not wish to enter into a debate regarding the power of the President to send our troops anywhere, to do anything. He already has the powers the President customarily has had, such as the power to use our troops to protect the property rights of our citizens, and so forth.

However, if we are attacked anywhere—for instance, an attack such as that on Pearl Harbor—certainly the President has the right to use our forces immediately to resist the attack. My resolution does not apply to such a situation as that.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from Nebraska then makes a distinction, does he, between our obligations under article 3 of the North Atlantic Pact and our obligations in a situation in which the security of the United States might suddenly become involved?

Mr. WHERRY. I do not want the President at this time to commit our troops abroad, under his constitutional authority, for purposes of carrying out the provisions of the North Atlantic Pact. If the President wishes to use our troops under the North Atlantic Pact, under article 3, let him come to Congress and ask for that authority.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Then the President would have to do that under article 5, would he?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes; and in case of such an attack, article 3 would not apply.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there is no Member of the Senate to whom I would prefer to yield than to the Senator who is now asking me to yield. However, an arrangement has already been made in regard to the program of the Senate today. Therefore, I hesitate to use very much more time, inasmuch as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is waiting to make his speech. I have forced him to wait quite a while, because following the conclusion of my speech I have been queried at considerable length.

I wonder whether the Senator from Nevada will mind if I yield to the junior Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly not; the Senator has the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well; I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator for the constructive and sincere tone of his remarks. I think it is most valuable to have that tone at this particular time.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is an advocate of air power, as I am. Of course, the North Atlantic Treaty concept embraces army, air, and navy.

Do I correctly understand that the Senator's resolution would make it impossible for the President of the United States to order an expert Air Force mechanic to our Air Force base in England at the present time?

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts was not on the floor when I explained my resolution. I have narrowed it, so that it now applies only to land troops that are to be supplied under the North Atlantic Treaty; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator speaks of ground forces. The Air Force has mechanics who are on the ground, and who are now in England, under the terms of the North Atlantic Pact. That is why I wanted to know whether the resolution covered them.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no dispute about that; they are there now, and no one is complaining about it.

Mr. LODGE. I am talking about replacements for them.

Mr. WHERRY. What I am talking about, as the Senator well knows, is the commitment of armed foot soldiers in divisions going to Europe to become a part of an integrated army. I am not questioning the President's power with respect to the Navy. I have said that in my speech. I am not questioning the power of the President to do what he has always done, or to do as he pleases. But I mean that I do not want him to make commitments to send American boys abroad to become part of an integrated army on the ground. I think that before that is determined, the Senate ought to have an opportunity to consider and determine such a policy, for many reasons.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that, but it seems to me that an expert mechanic—let us say a man who is an expert on instruments, or an expert on bombs, or an expert on airplane motors—a young American boy, who is a part of the North Atlantic force, is on the ground, and his presence in England in the next 3 weeks or 2 months might be very important. It merely seems to me, from the way the Senator's resolution is worded, that it would prevent the President from sending such a man abroad. I merely wanted that point elucidated.

Mr. WHERRY. No; I am sure the resolution would not have that effect, but if for any reason the Senator thinks it would, if he will suggest a modification, I will accept it. That is not the intention, at all. The intention is clear. My thought is that the President is going beyond his constitutional authority. As I said, I do not want to become involved in a constitutional argument, which could never be settled, but personally I think the President is going completely outside the Constitution and outside the North Atlantic Treaty, if he provides, by his own action, or by action on the part of the Secretary of State, or in whatever manner it may be done, through the executive branch, for a commitment of troops to the land army of Europe, without first submitting the matter to the Senate for decision, as provided in article 3.

Mr. LODGE. Would not the Senator's resolution more nearly meet his purpose if, instead of saying "ground forces," he were to say "combat units of the United States Army and United States Marine Corps?" Is not that what he means?

Mr. WHERRY. As I have already told the Senator, not on the floor but elsewhere, if the Senator is in doubt about whether, under the resolution, one man or another could be sent, or if the Senator feels that it would involve a violation of the North Atlantic Treaty as to sending the Air Force or the Navy, I should like to have him suggest a modification. I am getting back to the North Atlantic Pact. That is all that is intended by the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it involves the North Atlantic Pact. I was thinking of an amendment to strike out the words "ground force" and to substitute "combat units of the United States Army and the United States Marine Corps." It seems to me, from hearing the Senator's speech, that that is what he means.

Mr. WHERRY. That is perfectly all right with me. I will accept such an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I was merely trying to ascertain the Senator's intention. I do not propose the amendment, but I was trying to find out what the Senator had in his mind.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator can propose it.

Mr. LODGE. As the language is now drafted, it would include a mechanic's going to England for the purpose indicated.

Mr. WHERRY. That is not the intention.

Mr. LODGE. I understand.

Mr. WHERRY. I deeply appreciate the Senator's constructive suggestion, and, if this matter comes to a vote, I shall be very glad to modify the resolution. I shall also appreciate any other suggestions concerning it. I have no pride of authorship.

Mr. LODGE. I am studying the resolution very carefully, and I may have some further suggestions.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no one who has had more experience in Army circles than the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and I may say to him, since he was not present when I began, that all I am attempting to do is to prevent commitments being made by the President, under the Constitution, or under the North Atlantic Pact, with or without authority, until the matter comes to the Congress and a determination is made by the Congress. I shall be glad to change the language in any way that is satisfactory.

I may say there is something else I shall be glad to do. If the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee will make a statement on the floor of the Senate that he has advised with the President, and that he can assure the Senate that no commitments will be made along the line I have indicated until the policy has been determined, I shall be willing to withdraw the resolution, as in that case the purposes of the resolution would have been served. Does the Senator not think that a fair statement?

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator's remark shows his sincerity and his fairness, and I am glad to say that I should be opposed to having this or any similar resolutions buried in the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I may vote to have it referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, but if I do so vote, I am glad to assert now that I think the committee should report a resolution which will give a definite directive and a definite expression of the will of Congress.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator very much.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I introduced on January 11, 1951, S. 438, a bill the title of which is, "To provide economic, financial, and other aid to China."

That title is not inaccurate, but I want my colleagues to know that the main purpose of this bill is to provide military assistance to the Republic of China; and by "the Republic of China" I mean what the columnists refer to as "the Chinese Nationalists," the government presently headed by Gen. Chiang Kai-shek.

The bill which I have introduced is very similar to a bill having the same title which I introduced on February 25, 1949. My 1949 bill had its greater emphasis on economic and financial aid, but it also provided for substantial military aid. At that time it was necessary that military and economic aid complement each other. Today it is essential that military assistance be made paramount, with economic and financial aid still important, but secondary.

I am confident that, had the policy enunciated by my proposal in 1949 been vigorously undertaken, we would not find ourselves, as we do today, bogged down in a desperate struggle, with every advantage favoring our adversary, because we attempt to limit the scope of the conflict, while he really has the power to determine that issue.

Until we take the offensive in action—and I do not mean mounting a military offensive with our troops in Korea—we shall have to content ourselves with the fact that the enemy has the initiative, and is able to call the turn.

It should be perfectly obvious to anyone with even anserine intelligence that our past policy of letting the dust settle, has proven to be a bankrupt one. Unfortunately, Mr. President, the dust has settled on the boys whose bodies are buried in Korea. Surely no one in possession of the facts seriously believes that the Communist movement—and the Communist government—in China is anything but a stooge and tool of the Kremlin, a puppet playing its part in carrying out the Politburo's imperialistic design for world domination.

These are the facts we face. What then can we do about it?

Late as it is, I believe there is still some time left. Our range of possible action is more limited than it was; but if we will adopt an aggressive course, without further delay, we can still take action which will be effective to improve our situation.

On the Korean Peninsula we have a sizable military force. It is opposed by a vastly superior force of Chinese Communists. Whatever one may choose to call the present fighting, there is no escaping the fact that it is a real and serious war. And even though newspaper correspondents may bow to the edict that there are no retreats, but only withdrawals, and even though some may insist that the fighting in Korea is being done by forces of the United Nations, not forces of the United States, there is still no escaping the fact that American fighting men are taking a terrible licking.

Unless we are prepared to either commit additional United States forces, in very substantial numbers, or adopt some plan to divert the pressure in Korea, our boys are going to go on taking one licking after another.

Mr. President, this is a queer kind of war in Korea.

We are trying to fight it without admitting that we are in it. That makes it a tough war to fight, and an easy war to lose. In that kind of war, if the enemy loses, we do not win; but if the enemy wins, we lose. So if we are going to go on fighting this war, we are suckers if we do not use every weapon available to us.

Mr. President, the evidence is preponderant that weapons are available which we are failing to utilize; and I do not refer to the bomb. On the island of Formosa there are troops, Chinese troops, well trained but lacking much equipment. On the mainland of Asia there are from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 Chinese guerrillas. All of these forces are prepared to fight the Communists if we will provide the necessary equipment.

The time has come to use General Chiang's troops, and to make use of the available forces on the mainland, against the foe that is daily killing and wounding American boys.

The time has come for us to recognize facts as facts, and to begin to act on the basis that this fight is for keeps.

A man or a nation fighting only a defensive action can never win a victory; without offense, the best possible result is stalemate. But there are many forms of offense, and it is not unarguable that we must commit vast armies of American personnel in order to mount an offensive.

Realism and common sense require that we recognize the fact that the world Communist conspiracy is moving to encompass our downfall, and shape our own course accordingly. For the United States, the problem of Asia will be unsolved as long as China is controlled by a Russian-dominated Communist dictatorship. And so we must come eventually to a policy which embraces support of a non-Communist Chinese Government in China. Today, there is no non-Communist government which has any foothold on the Chinese mainland. But if we have not the vision to look ahead, we are self-condemned forever to the contemplation of what might have been.

Before we entered Korea, I said, in a speech in the Senate:

We cannot afford to mobilize the forces necessary for a crusade to liberate the Chinese people. We must avoid committing too many of our resources on the continent of Asia. Above all, we must avoid being maneuvered into a position where we look like foreign invaders attempting to subjugate an oriental people. But we cannot allow Russia to make an island civilization of the United States of America.

The United States, therefore, should be ready to get behind whatever forces rise to unify China, and should be resolved to do everything possible to help the redemption of China. In the meantime, we should support the one Chinese leader who is willing and able to get into the fight now—Gen. Chiang Kai-shek.

The majority of China's millions are not Communists. The Chinese basic devotion to the family precludes this worse-than-pagan philosophy. If the United States does not wait too long for the dust to settle, the majority of the Chinese people, given American help, and the help of the nations in the anti-Communist alliance, can be rallied to fight to expel communism from China. But they must have Chinese leadership. For if China is to be liberated, and remain free, the job of deliverance must be accomplished by the people of China themselves, not merely performed in their name.

Well, Mr. President, it was some months ago when I said that. But I think every word of it was true then, and every word of it is true now. That is why I have introduced a bill to give aid to the Republic of China.

The aid for which provision is made in this bill is divided into three separate categories. As I have already pointed out, the principal category is military assistance. Such assistance is the primary need, as of today. The most important thing we can do, right now, is make it possible for the Chinese Nationalists to invade the mainland of China. But it is of such importance only if done promptly. So done, it offers the best chance of retrieving victory in Asia. But if we are forced out of Korea, permitting the Red armies to be redeployed, the chance is gone.

My bill provides for $1,000,000,000 to be allocated to the Secretary of National Defense to be used in providing military assistance that is appropriate under the terms of the act. Among the terms of the proposal is a provision that the use of this aid shall be under the supervision of American military personnel, so as to insure its most effective utilization.

If the forces of Nationalist China, now in Formosa, should be able to invade the mainland and consolidate with the guerrilla forces there, it will become urgently necessary for the government of Nationalist China to exploit its successes by bringing to the areas which come under its control immediate economic help and certain financial stability. It is for this reason that my bill contains provisions to furnish such types of assistance when needed. The manner of furnishing either economic or financial assistance is stipulated in such terms as to insure profitable utilization and proper supervision.

Nearly 2 years ago 50 Senators signed a letter pleading for speedy action by the Foreign Relations Committee on the bill I had introduced in February 1949 to provide aid to the Republic of China. The signers of that letter constituted a majority of the Senate of the United States, but their pleas were ignored.

This time, I am not asking any of my colleagues to join me in signing a letter, because the time is very short; and anyway, on past performance, there is no evidence that a letter from some of us would accomplish its purpose. But I hope, Mr. President, that those of my colleagues who agree with me that this proposal should at least be considered will express themselves to those members of the Foreign Relations Committee whom they know best.

I also hope my friends in the Press and Radio Galleries will carry to the American people my warning that the chances are very slim indeed that the Chinese Nationalist forces will be aided or even permitted to get into this struggle, before it is too late, unless Congress orders it; and Congress certainly is not going to order it unless the proposal is at least considered and brought to a vote. If the people of the United States want the Chinese Nationalists brought into the fight to aid us in our struggle with the Chinese Communists, they had better make their voices heard in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. President, it appears that we face two alternatives in Asia. One of them is a new course of action—offensive action—action that will relieve the overburdening pressure of our forces in Korea. The other alternative is continued retreat and defeat. It does not appear possible to regain the ground we have lost in Korea without either committing very substantial additional forces of American soldiers to that conflict, or providing the Chinese Nationalists with assistance so as to enable them to mount an offensive that will divert much of the Chinese Communist strength. Certainly if we undertake a policy of actively aiding the Nationalist Chinese in such a struggle—a continuing daily, weekly struggle with the Communists—it will serve to subject the enemy to pressure, the kind of pressure to which we, so far, have been subjected.

There has been talk about the danger in such a course of action, and it is entirely proper that the cost of such a course should be considered. What might the bad results be? If the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa should attempt to invade the mainland, and this attempt should fail, would we be any worse off than we are now? We should be exactly where we are today. Such a failure would be cheap compared to the failure we are experiencing in Korea. Certainly the goals to be gained in the event of success far outweigh the cost in the event of failure.

Most of those who will oppose my bill belong to the school of thought which "wrote off" the Chinese Nationalists 2 years or more ago. So from their standpoint, if a "second front" can be opened on the Chinese mainland by action of the Chiang Kai-shek forces, something will have been created out of nothing; and if the attempt is made and fails, nothing will have been lost.

But there is a very real chance of success, so we must consider, if such a move is successful, what then?

Communist aggression in Asia will, in that event, have received its first major set-back.

All the world will see and understand the realism of such an event. The short-term results of such success would, of course, mean the freeing of Korea from Communist domination, the major objective we sought when we were pulled into the Korean conflict last June. The Communist pressure in Indochina would be relieved, and the forces of the United States would be free for any eventuality arising in Europe. More important, Mr. President, in the long run, would be the fact that Asians themselves had contributed the major force in preventing further Communist aggression and expansion.

Let me reemphasize that such a course of action, if it is to be successful, must be embarked upon in the immediate future. Time is of the essence, lest we find ourselves completely pushed out of Korea, and thus miss the opportune time to engage the enemy on two separate fronts. If we allow ourselves to be completely pushed out of Korea, the chances for a return by any democratic forces to the mainland of Asia within the foreseeable future are practically nonexistent. In such an event the vast power of the Chinese Communists will be free to provide further assistance to the Communist forces now engaging the French in Indochina, and certainly they will never be satisfied until all western democratic influence is expelled from the whole of Asia.

Most earnestly, Mr. President, and in the sincere belief that what is here proposed is in the national interest, I ask my colleagues in the Senate to give serious thought to this bill. It is much too late to waste time indulging in recriminations regarding where to place the blame for our mistakes of the past. They have been serious mistakes. But we dare not, in the name of unity, disregard the fact that mistakes have been made; nor, in an attempt to prove there were no mistakes, let ourselves be hoodwinked by propaganda designed inevitably to destroy the power of the United States.

We act as though we were shadow-boxing, while the enemy is fighting for keeps. But our boys in Korea know we are not shadow-boxing. The dead bodies of the thousands of men who lie buried in the soil of Korea give testimonial that the enemy is not shadow-boxing.

Why should our military forces be subjected to restricting and hampering decisions of the diplomatic table when the enemy is free to engage in all-out military action against our troops?

Why will we not admit that we are in a war? In a war, we ought to welcome any and all allies. Certainly the Chinese Nationalist troops in Formosa are ready, willing, and able to be our allies.

The time has arrived to do a little nose counting. If our past allies will support us, well and good. If not, let us not for any purpose of appeasement, sacrifice the ideals of our people, ideals which have been bought and preserved by the sacrifices of countless Americans of all generations.

For these treasured ideals, which are so difficult to define yet so simple that our children understand them, we entered the United Nations. Because of them we undertook and carried out vast programs of relief and assistance to people throughout the world.

For the sake of these ideals, we sent our boys to fight an aggressor in Korea.

Our ideals have been the guiding spirit which has sustained and encouraged this Nation in its darkest hours.

Talking now not about the marches and countermarches of military tactics, but about basic policy, I say that today, Mr. President, we must face squarely the issue of whether we go forward with positive offensive action, or back down in the face of Communist aggression and compromise those ideals which have made us great.

If the answer is made by the American people, I am sure that it will be a resounding "Forward."

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator be so kind as to yield for a quorum call, provided his right to the floor is not prejudiced?

Mr. KERR. I am glad to yield, if I may do so without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded, and that further proceedings under the order be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY AND THE CHALLENGE FACING THE NATION

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, the world resounds today with the harsh din of conflict. The unbridled ambitions of dictators are in mortal combat with the determination of free men to preserve their liberty. This furious clash between the forces of good and evil, involving both our own security and the peace of the world, confronts us with some of the most vexing problems and difficult decisions of all time.

The President of the United States has defined the most critical issue that confronts this Congress. He has described with great vigor and clarity the deadly challenge with which the American people and their way of life are face to face. With equal vigor and clarity he has outlined the plan by which we can meet and overcome this challenge.

I congratulate the President for his courage and frankness in naming the threat of world conquest by Soviet Russia as the gravest danger and evil in the world today.

There are those who claim that this crisis, that the great danger which threatens us, that the awful evil we face, are the results of the failure of the foreign policy of this Government.

Mr. President, I do not agree with that conclusion. I take a fierce pride in the knowledge that our present foreign policy has been developed, and is presently maintained, on a bipartisan basis. It is the product of the finest thinking of many of the ablest men in both parties, and it has been authorized and approved by the overwhelming majority of members of both parties in the Congress.

Already time and trial have proved their wisdom. It is not the failure but the success of American bipartisan foreign policy which has swiftly bared the motives of the ruthless Red dictators. It is not the weakness but the strength of democratic resistance which has frustrated the Soviets' bold designs and moved them to risk world crisis and conflict.

Yes, the lashing of the tentacles of the Russian octopus, and the rattling of the sabers of Communist aggression are the struggles of the evil monster infuriated by opposition and restraint. That opposition and that restraint have been produced through the bipartisan foreign policy of this Government.

The continuing failure of the octopus to reach out and easily grasp its victims must be credited to the successful efforts of this Nation and our allies. These forces of freedom—in America and around the globe—stand firm in their resolution to shackle that evil monster and thwart its wicked purpose.

The present clash of arms in Korea, costly as it is, awful as we know it to be, is the result of the firm resolve of this Nation and 52 others of the United Nations to stop aggression wherever it rears its ugly head, instead of permitting it to roar unchecked to our own shores.

Our President referred to "the threat of world conquest by Soviet Russia" as the gravest evil of our day. Were it not for the bipartisan American foreign policy and the success it has achieved thus far, world conquest by Soviet Russia would not today be a threat—it would be a reality.

It was the purpose of the greedy men in the Kremlin to dominate the world. They hoped to do so by propaganda, if possible. If that failed, they hoped to do so through infiltration, through revolution from within, and by the diabolical process of taking over other nations, one by one, through corrupting their weaker men and twisting them into traitors for communism. If all these failed, then Soviet Russia schemed to conquer by military power.

Mr. President, Soviet Russia is failing in her effort to extend her domination beyond the iron curtain. She is failing to extend her empire with her evil propaganda. She is failing today to achieve her purpose through internal revolution and betrayal of her neighbors by their own citizens.

Flagrant military aggression by the satellites of the Soviet Union is the last fling of the dice, save one, and one alone.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. LONG. In line with the Senator's statement, is it not true that communism has never been freely accepted by peoples anywhere? At least, so far as the junior Senator from Louisiana can recall, everywhere that communism has ever gone it went at the point of the bayonet, either by revolution or by conquest, but the people of no nation have freely made it a Communist state.

Mr. KERR. I think the Senator from Louisiana is entirely correct. I believe the correctness of his statement applies even to Russia itself. I think the Russian people were the first ones to become the slaves of the Communist group.

Mr. LONG. And at that time a very small percentage of the people were actually Communists.

Mr. KERR. I think the Senator is absolutely correct.

The very last gamble by these international bandits—and God forbid that—would be to hurl the Red army and the Red air force into the balance.

Our bipartisan foreign policy and the President's proposals, if wholeheartedly supported by the American people, will build the democracy's military power to overcome the threat of the Soviet satellites. They will provide the strength which will either prevent the moving of the Red army and the Red air force or defeat and destroy them if they are moved.

Our aim, Mr. President, is security and tranquillity at home and peace abroad.

Our purpose is to prevent, if possible, any enlargement of the present degree of war which has been thrust upon us.

Our program is to develop enough production and enough power to guarantee the security of our own country and to lead the free peoples of the world in a joint responsible effort to achieve world peace.

This program, Mr. President, not only meets the requirements of our own people, but in the eloquent language of the Atlantic Charter, it will guarantee that "all of the men in all of the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and freedom from want."

Our plan, Mr. President, is to realize that aim, accomplish that purpose, and implement that program through preserving and improving and operating our great bipartisan foreign policy. It has been successful and it has been bipartisan.

Our plan brought about the creation of the United Nations. It has held us firm in our support and participation. I know the United Nations is still far from being what we had desired, what we now hope for, and what we intend it shall be; but it is still mankind's greatest achievement in an age-long struggle for peace.

While its weaknesses have been made dramatically clear in these past months under a baptism of fire, the United Nations is still the greatest hope for peace in the heart of a war-torn world. If we give it, today and tomorrow, the wise and abundant support and patience of which we are capable, it will yet be the instru-mentality whereby peace will come to the people of this earth.

Our master plan, Mr. President, brought protection to Iran, Greece, and Turkey against Soviet encroachment. It provided economic aid to strengthen and rebuild the free nations. It brought into being the North Atlantic Pact. This effective pattern of mutual aid, fashioned by our Nation, has been embraced by most of the people of the free world. By this means democracy has thus firmly set its course and is on the way to victory.

Mr. President, we must not be lured from the highway of destiny to a strange and risky detour.

Today there are some who would tamper with our master plan to the point of destroying its usefulness and its magnificent opportunity. Others, while giving lip service to the plan's objectives, would force the adoption of other entirely different mediums which either have been rejected heretofore or which, by the very urgency of the present crisis, could not be tested, tried, or proved.

What are these new and untried plans? Who is it that proposes them? For whom do their proponents speak?

I do not know, Mr. President, for whom Mr. Hoover speaks. I know he does not speak for the Republican Party of Vandenberg, Dewey, or Dulles. I know he does not speak for the Republican Party of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. ALEXANDER WILEY, and his colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee of this Senate. But I do know the folly of Mr. Hoover's efforts. If he is able to make us forsake the bipartisan plan we have already embraced, or if he can bring about the delay and confusion of endless bickering, he would succeed only in compelling this mighty Nation to spin its wheels in neutral when it should be surging full speed ahead.

I do know that his words were spread across the pages of the party organ of the bloody dictator in Moscow.

Mr. President, some men become statesmen, some men become elder statesmen, but some men merely become elder. I regard Herbert Hoover as a fine, patriotic American. I cast no doubt upon his motives as a patriotic citizen. But, Mr. President, I can never forget that when he was determining the policies of this Government, a mighty nation was driven to its knees in economic despair, depression, and want. America will never forget its bitter experience of 20 years ago; and, as it remembers, it is warned. What a contrast there is between Franklin D. Roosevelt and Herbert Hoover. The beloved Roosevelt, though dead, lives on in the hearts and thoughts of millions. Hoover, though living, is part and parcel of the past that is dead and gone.

Then, Mr. President, we have the proposals of the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. No man has a higher regard for his character and patriotism than I. I recognize his intellect; but frankly, Mr. President, I cannot determine for myself whether his purpose, in fact, is only to oppose the present American bipartisan foreign policy or some of its operations, or whether his real aim is to put the mighty dynamo of American power into neutral or reverse. The first would be very dangerous; the second would be disastrous.

I know, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio does not speak for the colleagues of his own party in the Foreign Relations Committee of this Senate. A vacancy has just been filled in the minority membership of that committee, Mr. President, which I dare say that the Senator from Ohio could have claimed if he had so desired. Can it be that he would rather exclude himself from that committee in order to criticize its work, rather than assume the responsibility for hard decisions that must be taken because of our position in world affairs? Ah, the Senator clearly has a right to speak his own mind, and none can do so more forcefully than he; but I cannot believe that the great State of Ohio has given him a mandate to reverse this Nation's bipartisan foreign policy or, for that matter, to frustrate the same purpose of other leaders of his own party.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield for a question.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Oklahoma has made an observation about the right of the Senator from Ohio to a place on the Foreign Relations Committee. The Senator from Ohio was quoted in the press, and I have in my office a clipping to this effect, as saying that he did not choose to go on the Foreign Relations Committee because he wanted to be free to criticize the policy which was adopted in that committee. I shall send for the clipping and show it to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The Senator probably has overlooked the statement by the Senator from Ohio himself that he would choose not to be on that committee; he wanted to stand aside, so that he could pot-shot at it.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator. I had thought that our good friend, the Senator from Ohio, would rather be critical than be informed; and it may be that the statement the Senator has just referred to bears that out.

Mr. President, the Republican Eightieth Congress and the Democratic Eighty-first Congress, by majority votes of members of both parties, after long and vigorous debate, settled the fundamental question which both Mr. Hoover and the distinguished Senator from Ohio now attempt to raise. On June 11, 1948, the Senate by a vote of 64 to 4 adopted the Vandenberg resolution. In that historic paper, the Senate declared that the United States should take part in regional and other collective arrangements which are based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, and which affect our national security.

A little more than a year later—on July 21, 1949—the Senate expressly, and in concrete form, approved what it had earlier approved in general, by voting decisively to ratify the North Atlantic Pact. That treaty was thoroughly debated, and I remember that the Senator from Ohio and others who opposed it had full opportunity to bring out all their arguments against its ratification. However, they were able to muster only 13 negative votes, as compared with the 82 votes that resulted in the adoption of that treaty, and making it the law of the land.

This Government then and there decided that we would join with Western Europe in building an effective defense by common effort and mutual support against the threat of Soviet communistic aggression.

Therefore, Mr. President, I would hope that the distinguished Senator from Ohio could now give his powerful support to our American bipartisan program and to the North Atlantic Pact. The fate of our country may depend upon how well that treaty works. I know it would work far better with the Senator's support than with his continued opposition.

Article 3 of the treaty reads:

> In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Mr. President, the United States of America did not enter into that treaty out of impulse or kindness in our hearts or just out of sympathy for Western Europe. We agreed to take part in that compact in our own self-interest and because we found it necessary to the preservation of our own national security.

That is the reason, Mr. President, why that treaty should now be implemented as effectively as possible. That is the criterion by which our decisions should be made to support that treaty and make it work.

Mr. President, it is abundantly evident to every man, woman, and child in the land, and must be so recognized by Mr. Hoover and by the Senator from Ohio, that the urgent need for strengthening our defenses against Soviet aggression is far more apparent today than when the treaty was signed and ratified.

This is the vital question, Mr. President: Will we make the security of the United States more certain by helping to build great defenses and strength among the nations of Western Europe; or will we repudiate our bi-partisan foreign policy and the North Atlantic Pact, and see Western Europe, which is the greatest possible source of help we can ever have, taken over and used to make the common enemy stronger, while we would be thus made weaker?

When primordial man first left the cave, and joined with other men in the most primitive community, he learned that cooperation with his fellows was necessary in order to achieve law and order. Can it be that some men have become so civilized that they not only forget that basic law of survival, but even deny its existence?

Both Mr. Hoover and the Senator from Ohio surround their arguments with if's, like a picket fence, but they add up to the same thing.

Mr. Hoover says, "Do not send a single American soldier or American dollar until Europe itself erects a sure dam that can hold back Russian communism."

Mr. President, if they could do that, they would not need, and we would not propose, our help; but in the present circumstances that is an impossible condition. That is like saying "Don't go near the water until you have learned how to swim." Even the blind can see that Western Europe is absolutely unable to build an effective defense against Stalinism without our help.

The Senator from Ohio at one time proposed that the United States extend the Monroe Doctrine to cover Europe. What folly. What he called for then would mean an unlimited commitment by the United States alone. However, now, in direct contradiction, he opposes sending American troops to Europe to fulfill even the limited cooperative commitment we have under the treaty.

He would put up a posted sign to keep out the Russian giant, but would not station enough guards there to stop bandit pygmies. He says we would go to Europe only after an attack was made. That would be to advertise to the world that too little and too late had become the official American policy. Oh, yes; he would give the patient a little stimulant now, but would wait until the patient was dead before offering the transfusion required to save his life.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. Will the Senator not say that the question is more one of whether we should send troops, rather than of who should send them, whether it be by authority of the President or by authority of the Congress? Does the Senator not think that in all the debate which has been taking place in the Senate we have been wasting time on the question of jurisdiction, rather than discussing the question of whether the foreign policy of the United States should be to implement the North Atlantic Treaty? Does not the Senator think that we should spend more time discussing the question whether the United States should implement that agreement by sending troops, than in discussing the question, whether the President has that authority, or whether the Congress should say whether the troops should go?

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator for the question. I think there has been evidence of delay, but I frankly think that in view of all the circumstances, the delay will result in more of good than of bad. It seems to me that we are perhaps in the same situation as the woman jury. It was the first time the women had ever served on a jury, and the first time that the court had ever had a woman jury. The court gave a very simple case to the jury for consideration, and, after the evidence was in and the arguments made, he gave his instructions. The jury retired to consider the verdict. They were in the jury room for about 2 days. Finally, the judge called them in and asked them whether anything was wrong. They told him "No." He said, "Did you understand the evidence?" They said, "Quite well." "And the instructions?" "Oh, yes; they were very plain." "Well," said the judge, "what about a verdict?" One good lady said, "Well, Your Honor, we haven't gotten around to considering the verdict," He said, "Is that so? May I inquire as to what you have been doing?" She said, "Why, certainly. We have been trying to elect a foreman." [Laughter.] I believe that as a result of this debate, we shall agree on a foreman, on the implementing of a basic agreement already made, on a better understanding of what the agreement is, on a better understanding of what the implementation of it will do, and on a better understanding of what the failure to implement it, with the full support of the American people, would bring about in the way of tragic results.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Even though we finally elect a foreman, does not the Senator believe that there will be a great many straw bosses?

Mr. KERR. I think it would not hurt if we had a few straw bosses, if we operated it on the basis of getting to the point where their feeling of self-improvement would be gratified, and if the general program would not be delayed too long in the process. I think that is all right, because in a democracy we all have the right of expression, we all have the right of participation, and we all have the right of implementation of decisions. I think it far better that we take this time in crystallizing the sentiment and the wishes of the people in support of a program which has been adopted and which, the more it is discussed, the more worth while it will become, or will appear to be. I think the taking of that time will, in the long run, be very wholesome.

Mr. President, in the present titanic struggle of international diplomacy, as our Government for itself, and in leading our allies, seeks to prevent or stop aggression, it needs the fullest possible cooperation and support of all of its people and of the leaders of both of its great political parties. Yet, Mr. President, as it has in these past months sought to make some of its most important moves, many Republican leaders, either knowingly or unknowingly, have sought to neutralize those moves and make them futile and useless.

First was their stunning blow hurled at the American Secretary of State. Just before Christmas, Mr. Acheson flew to Brussels to meet the foreign ministers of our allies in the North Atlantic Pact. This Nation needed him to be as strong as we could make him. He was going there to take part in discussions in connection with General Eisenhower's appointment as supreme commander of the allied forces for Western Europe. Yet, at that critical moment a majority of the Republican Members of the Congress repudiated him and demanded his removal. They sent him into action with his hands tied behind his back.

In the same way, Mr. President, just as General Eisenhower was leaving to plan the building of the North Atlantic Treaty defense forces in Europe, the Senator from Ohio delivered on this floor a speech calculated to undermine the whole common defense effort.

The Senator and others, notably Mr. Hoover, have complained that the Europeans are not doing enough for their own and the joint defense. Yet, at the very moment that General Eisenhower was preparing to urge them to make a greater effort, the Senator made a speech which could have no other result than to chill their blood with fear and take the starch out of their backbones.

Mr. President, none could fail to recognize that the free people of Europe have been struggling since VE-day to roll back the black clouds of misery, despair, and gloom. It has been our purpose to help them walk into the sunlight of hope and strength. Let our Republican friends beware, Mr. President, lest by their opposition they create a total eclipse for those whose strength is so necessary for themselves and so vital to us.

Mr. President, surely these Republican leaders cannot fail to know that these actions are greeted in Moscow with jubilant pleasure, but received with dismay among our friends and allies in western Europe. The motives of those who sought to embarrass the Secretary of State are quite evident. I must leave it to those who embarrass General Eisenhower to name their motives for doing so and to answer for them.

Mr. Hoover and the great Senator from Ohio deny that the program they propose is isolationism, but their denials have a hollow sound.

The only way to cooperate is to cooperate. Either we have a common danger against which there is a common defense, or we do not. If we do not, then cooperation should be abandoned; but if we do, and I submit that any high school student can recognize the certainty that we do, then isolationism should be abandoned and cooperation should be made a vital and dynamic reality.

The Senator from Ohio says he has seen no evidence that Soviet Russia will attack Western Europe at all. My distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] has already pointed out the similarity between that statement by Senator TAFT and the one made by the late Senator Borah. Only 6 weeks before World War II broke out, Borah declared that his own sources of information, contrary to those available to the State Department, assured him that there would be no war.

In fact, I am struck by the parallel between certain attitudes now and some that existed in the period just before World War II. The same attitude of retreatism and defeatism infected many people whose opinions were respected. I recall some nonsense about nazism and fascism being the "wave of the future." It was described as the inevitable shape of things to come—and, therefore, we should bend to the storm and join with this irresistible new force, because we could not defeat it.

Can it be that the insidious propaganda about the "inevitable triumph of communism" has poisoned the minds of some in this country, and that unconsciously they are adopting an attitude of retreatism and defeatism? The best antidote for that kind of nerve warfare is the same kind of realism, courage, and energy that carried the fight to our enemies in the last war and brought victory to the free nations.

If we are deceived and beguiled into withdrawing into our own castle and trying to fortify it without regard to the safety of our neighbors, sooner or later we will be under siege, with the total resources of the rest of the world marshaled against us.

There are 153,000,000 people in the United States; approximately 300,000,000 in the Western Hemisphere. My faith in my God and my country forbid a prophecy of doom, but stark reality hurls the question: How long could these numbers stand up against the 2,000,000,000 people in the rest of the world, if they were under the control of a ruthless and fanatic aggressor?

On the other hand, if we use the strength of this inner citadel of ours, this core of freedom's power, to attach worthy allies to our cause and reinforce the entire democratic world, we stand a good chance of preventing an attack on any of us. But, if the attack does come, it can be met far from our own shores and with the rebuilt strength of our allies added to our own.

While some of the minority party attack our foreign policy by advising us to abandon our advanced position in Western Europe and our allies there, others urge us to take steps that would involve us in war on the mainland of China. If we took seriously all this conflicting counsel from the discordant elements of the Republican Party, we would weaken ourselves disastrously by ditching our allies in Europe and taking on an impossible war, much farther from home, against the unlimited manpower of China. The best way to guarantee the success of Soviet communism and our own failure would be to follow the prescriptions of the divided Republican Party.

Some critics of our foreign policy want a bargain-basement defense force. They say we can cut the cost by building up a great air force and a navy while maintaining a small land army. That has to be just another argument for isolation, because that kind of a set-up condemns us to sit back and wait for the enemy to come after us. No war has ever been won, that I know of, without a land army, and we must not risk our national existence on any such unbalanced, unproved defense.

Of course, our economy is important and it will be encouraged and vastly enlarged, but our freedom is no less important. In 1940, we thought one and three-fourths billion dollars was all we could spend on defense, yet in 1942, we spent $94,000,000,000, and in 1944, $87,000,000,000. Last year, we thought $13,000,000,000 was as much as we could spend on our Military Establishment. However, in the past 6 months we have provided $42,000,000,000. The cost of defense is relative to the need.

How much will you pay to live? What price liberty? What price freedom? What price the American way of life?

No man can give us the specifications of the minimum in unity and effort and preparation that will guarantee the security of our beloved Nation. At such a time as this, who would dare to risk all to the bare minimum specified by a few self-appointed armchair strategists?

I remember the story of the French count who wanted to hire a driver for the carriage which took his children to and from school. There was a narrow place along the road; on one side, a steep, high cliff, and on the other side, a deep chasm. He questioned the applicants for the job. He asked each one how near he could drive to the edge of the chasm safely. He was told by one, 12 inches, another 6 inches, and another with haughty pride, proclaimed, "I can drive along the very edge in perfect safety."

Then came one who replied: "I don't know how near I can drive to the edge of the chasm in safety, but I can drive that carriage so close to the cliff on the other side of the road that once in a while I will knock a little paint off the hub cap, but then I will know that your children will be safe."

We should search the recesses of our hearts and fortify our minds and conscience against the questions of our own children. They will speak to us either from the depths of an enforced bondage, or from the glory of a continued American way of life. God grant that they will not ask, "Why did you do so little that you failed to get by?" Let us be certain that they can say: "Thank you for doing enough to let us live as you have lived as free men."

Under the leadership of the President, we have a program for security and for victory—a program already approved in broad outline by the majority of the Senate. Let us get on with the job of implementing that program with whatever it takes to insure success.

We know our greatest danger from without comes from Soviet Russia. But within there is another almost as deadly. It is the threat that the creeping paralysis of fear and dissension will become an opiate to our will and a shackle to our feet. No combination of powers, Mr. President, can defeat us and the allies we now have, if we remain united and acquit ourselves like men, in the American tradition. It is not in that tradition to give up just because the going is rough. Washington had his Valley Forge; Lincoln had his dark days of discouragement. Are we to be craven because we have suffered reverses? Or, shall we take renewed determination to win, come what may?

Some have asked: How strong is our present leadership? How strong are our President and Secretary of State? The answer is: They are as strong as the unity and purpose of the American people make them.

Already, we face a sobering challenge written in blood and tears on the distant fields of battle. Our heroic fighting men have demonstrated the value of teamwork in meeting the common enemy. They have shown the ability to practice the most effective unity under the most trying conditions.

We shall always remember Hungnam. This epic operation snatched a great American force from the very teeth of the enemy. It will go down in history as one of the most brilliant examples of coordinated effort by Army, Navy, and Air Force.

This sets an example for us here at home. We should take to heart this stirring lesson, and we should apply the same principles of unity, courage, and energy. Together we must move full speed ahead to complete the sound program we already have started for the joint defense of the free world.

How can we rally and lead the other nations in this great coalition of free people if we ourselves do not demonstrate the qualities of leadership and united effort? How can we inspire confidence in others if we lose confidence in ourselves? The questions answer themselves.

Joint defense must start at home. Our common hope and faith must be rooted in the heart of every individual. Leadership is the duty of a strong, rich America, and the responsibilities for that leadership fall upon every one of us.

One of those who has responded magnificently to this requirement for leadership, Mr. President, is our distinguished colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The Senate, the United States and the free nations owe a great debt of gratitude to him for his strong and effective leadership as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in this trying time. If we all respond to the challenge that confronts us as well as the senior Senator from Texas, there will be no doubt as to the outcome.

I want to take this occasion to pay sincere tribute also to those leaders of the Republican Party who are working for unity. One of those is the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who has given generously of his wisdom and his strength to help construct our bipartisan foreign policy. A few days ago, he again performed a service for his country when he said:

> Our national heritage and the fate of the free world continue to call for a dependable common front where we and our allies all can be relied on at home and abroad to do our full part.

Then there is John Foster Dulles, who is ably and loyally serving to bring the free nations into a stronger accord. Mr. Dulles is no less a Republican for having declared 2 weeks ago:

> Any nation which at a moment of supreme danger sheds those of its allies who are most endangered, and to whom it is bound by solemn treaty, by common heritage and by fellowship in war and peace, is scarcely in a position thereafter to do much picking and choosing for its own account. It elects a dangerous course, for solitary defense is never impregnable.

Furthermore, there is Governor Dewey, who, far from accepting the philosophy of retreatism and defeatism, is urging us to build up the common defense at an even faster rate. There are other Republicans I could name with these who are not only preaching, but practicing unity in this critical hour. This is the spirit which will save our country and our civilization.

These men express the true spirit and the real sentiments of the American people. On the other hand, those who seek to place themselves at the head of a parade and lead the American people into a storm cellar will find that they have few followers. There is no body of sand wherein we can bury our heads deep enough without leaving other portions of our anatomy, equally tender, exposed to destruction.

There can be honest differences of opinion among those who have the best interests of their country at heart. But I think some of those opinions, including those of Mr. Hoover and the Senator from Ohio, are ill-conceived and cannot stand the light of searching analysis. I am convinced that this is true in spite of the fact that the Senator from Ohio is "Mr. Republican," himself, and that Mr. Hoover is just as certainly "the late Mr. Republican."

Mr. President, the bitter lessons of our own history teach us that when danger closes in from without, or threatens from within, we must resolve our differences and fortify ourselves in unity. We are reminded that once before dissension and opposing interests so inflamed the minds of the people that the Nation was momentarily torn asunder. In that dark hour, nearly 100 years ago, the issue had to be resolved in a tragic civil war.

In that somber period of our history, the resulting conflict brought loss and damage only to ourselves. Today, we are the recognized leaders of the free peoples of the world. The cost of doubt and dissension to all who look to us with hope would be incalculable. Let us beware, lest in sowing the seeds of disunity among ourselves today, we do not reap a world-wide whirlwind of distrust, repudiation, and global catastrophe tomorrow.

My good friend, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], in his eloquent speech here a few days ago, asked, "Is this the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light before an endless night shall envelop us and all the Western World?" I am sure the Senator agrees with me that valiant American fighting men are giving the answer to that question in Korea, in Germany, in all our outposts, and in the training camps at home. The American people are giving the answer in the factories, on the farms, in the schools and offices and homes all over America.

Mr. President, the twilight hour has an appearance much like the hour just before the dawn. I believe in America. I believe in our heritage of freedom, of courage, of tenacity, of integrity, and of honor. I have unlimited faith in America. If we are true to ourselves and our heritage, this is not the twilight hour, but the hour before the dawn of a new and brighter day. That day will surely break, if we but dissipate the threatening cloud that is now so small and can be so easily dispelled—the cloud of confusion, of disunity, of doubt in our own strength and our own destiny.

I believe profoundly that there is more in the history of America than meets the eye. When I recall the discovery, the settlement, and the growth of this country as a land of opportunity and freedom, where a great experiment in the self-government and self-realization of man could be worked out—when I consider how this Nation, under God, through the years has achieved a constantly higher standard of material and spiritual development—I cannot, I do not believe that God has raised up this Nation as a beacon of hope for all aspiring peoples, only to have America struck down by a Godless and oppressive regime before its highest destiny is fulfilled. In all humility, I have the deepest conviction that America will go steadily forward as the standard-bearer of the hopes and yearnings of humanity for a better life. Nothing can defeat us but ourselves.

America has come of age in a new world. Our country has reached maturity as the honored leader of all those who aspire to a noble and decent life, in peace and harmony with their fellow men. Only this Nation has the strength and vigor to lead the world to freedom from fear and freedom from want.

I know Senators recall the story of the feeding of the multitudes by Jesus of Nazareth. Through the long day He had taught and worked with them and then provided for their physical needs. As the day wore on and evening approached, the great crowd went home. They came again on another day, but when they learned the stern duties of His service, we are told that again many "went back and walked no more with him." This left the Master alone with the Twelve. He turned to them and said: "Will ye also go away?" To which the irrepressible Peter responded with a question of his own: "Master, if we leave Thee, to whom shall we go?"

Mr. President, under our great bipartisan foreign policy, we have encouraged and helped our allies in the Western World and in the North Atlantic community. We have strengthened them with material help and with that more priceless intangible ingredient, moral and spiritual cooperation. It has been a long day and some are tired—but, Mr. President, the task is far from finished.

If the hundreds of millions of freedom-loving people in the other nations who are willing to work and, if necessary, fight for peace cannot turn to the United States of America for leadership and effective cooperation, to whom shall they go?

Mr. President, there is but one answer, and it is unthinkable.

We Americans of this generation, who enjoy the greatest way of life that man has ever developed or known, are determined that it shall be protected and preserved for ourselves and as a priceless heritage to our children. We cannot do less than our best. We cannot give less than the highest of which we are capable. Thus, we will build that unity of thought and purpose and action among ourselves and with our allies that will carry us forward to that certain success for which every American hopes and prays.

Mr. McCLELLAN obtained the floor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of introducing a couple of bills and making a few remarks?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to my colleague for that purpose without prejudice to my rights to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, I should like to congratulate the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] for a very fine speech. I wish also to refer to the speech of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] yesterday, which I regard as an extremely important presentation of the facts relating to this subject.

I had intended today to address the Senate on the subject of foreign relations. However, after reading the newspapers this morning and noting how many speeches had been made yesterday, in the Senate and elsewhere, plus the press releases, I decided to defer my own discussion for a few days.

I was particularly impressed by some of the reports in the press this morning which seemed to me to be extremely belligerent and inflammatory with regard to Russia. It is my own view that we still should do everything possible to avoid a war, rather than precipitate one. I am inclined to think that perhaps it may be beneficial to the country, for a few days, at least, if we may have sufficient quietude to digest the vast mass of information which has been presented in the speeches of the past few days.

Mr. President, I now desire to introduce the bills to which I referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas may proceed.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNING BODY OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill proposing a fundamental reorganization of the governing body of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I have before me a description of the bill, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, together with the bill itself, for the information of the Senate. In view of the fact that there are so few Members of the Senate present, I believe that in order to save the time of the Senate it would be better for me to place the statement in the RECORD. There is no point in reading it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 514) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to provide for the elimination of the Board of Directors, and to vest the management of the Corporation in a Governor, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) section 2 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a Governor appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Governor shall be appointed for a term of 3 years, but he may continue in office until his successor is appointed and qualified. The Governor shall be eligible for reappointment. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of Governor, other than by expiration of term, the person appointed to fill such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired portion of the term. The Governor shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as Governor, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $17,500 per annum. The Governor is authorized to appoint two Deputy Governors to assist in the execution of the functions vested in the Corporation. Deputy Governors shall be paid at the rate of $15,000 per annum."

(b) The word "Governor" shall be substituted for the word "director," "directors," and "board of directors" wherever such word or words appear in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 60 days after the date of its enactment, and the offices, powers, and duties of the Board of Directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall thereupon terminate.

The statement presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

GOVERNOR OF RFC

This bill proposes a fundamental reorganization of the RFC. It proposes that the management of the Corporation shall be vested in a single Governor, who shall take the place of the present five-man Board of Directors. It also proposes that the Board of Directors shall cease to exist 60 days after the date of its enactment.

The purpose of this change is to strengthen the management of Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in this way to enhance its true usefulness during the difficult periods which lie ahead of the Nation.

During much of its existence RFC operated successfully under the supervision of a Federal Loan Administrator, whose authority transcended that of the RFC directors and who functioned, in practical effect, as the General Manager of RFC. In 1947, for the first time since 1939, the Board of Directors became the governing body in RFC.

The position of Governor of the RFC would be a position of considerable responsibility. It should attract the interest of a man of adequate stature and background. Such a man would not be attracted by the prospect of serving as one of five directors with the strong possibility that his four colleagues would be of inferior stature and background. I am convinced that the organization structure proposed in this bill will make it possible for the Government to take into its employ for this position a leader who would not otherwise be willing to devote his efforts to the public service.

A single administrator has proven successful in such lending agencies as the Farm Credit Administration and the Rural Electrification Administration.

The Hoover Commission, in its report on regulatory commissions, referred to this general problem when it said, quoting from page 5:

"Administration by a plural executive is generally regarded as inefficient."

The history of the surplus-property agencies affords an interesting analogy. In the words of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, Eightieth Congress, "In actual operation, the three-man Surplus Property Board failed to accomplish its primary objective. * * * The unwieldy three-man Surplus Property Board was therefore abolished and replaced by a single Surplus Property Administrator."

For the past 2 years, the Board of Directors has been an entirely unsatisfactory vehicle of management for the important responsibilities with which RFC has been entrusted.

The study which has recently been made by the Subcommittee on RFC has shown that in a five-man board, it is possible for the individual members to avoid their responsibilities by "passing the buck" from one to the other, or to subordinate employees of the Corporation. We have found instances in which individual members of the Board have brought about the approval of loans by interference in the work of subordinate employees and in disregard of established operating policies of the Corporation. In these cases the applications would otherwise have been rejected. We have found instances in which important loans were made upon the affirmative vote of a minority of the Board members. We have found a large number of instances in which the Board of Directors has approved the making of loans, over the adverse advice of the Corporation's most experienced examiners and reviewing officials, notwithstanding the absence of compelling reasons for doing so and the presence of convincing reasons for not doing so.

Under the organization form proposed in this bill the side-stepping of responsibility would no longer be possible. If the management of RFC were vested in one man there would be no way in which he could escape the responsibility for the Corporation's acts. This change should greatly strengthen the control which the Congress will exercise on behalf of the people of the Nation over the lending of public money to private individuals and business concerns.

With the enormous growth which has taken place in the Federal establishment since the beginning of the Second World War, there has been a considerable increase in the number of people who must be appointed by the President to important positions in the Government. The number of appointments which must be reviewed for confirmation by the Senate has also increased. Necessarily, the relative importance of each appointment and the relative degree of high-level attention which can be given to the selection of officials has decreased accordingly. In recent years the appointment of the directors of RFC has come to be treated as a matter of little moment.

I am convinced that the change proposed by this bill will enhance the prestige of the RFC management sufficiently so that the President will give his personal attention to the selection of the Corporation's Governor. I am convinced also that the qualifications of a nominee for this position will be examined with considerably more care in the Senate than would the nominations of five men appointed to a board. This alone would justify the change proposed in this bill under the circumstances in which the Federal Government finds itself today.

REVISION OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill which relates to the revision of the basic Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, together with a statement which I have prepared in connection with the bill for the information of the Senate.

I may say that this revision relates to various aspects of the basic legislation, such as the method of financing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. As an example of what I mean, the bill provides for the appropriation of a revolving fund for the financing of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in place of its present borrowing power. There are other provisions of similar character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 515) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. (a) There is hereby created a body corporate with the name 'Reconstruction Finance Corporation' (herein called the Corporation). It shall be the duty of said Corporation to aid in financing industry, agriculture, commerce, to encourage small business, to help in maintaining the economic stability of the country, to assist in promoting maximum employment and production and, when specifically directed, to perform certain duties and functions in connection with the national defense and foreign policy programs of the United States. The principal office of the Corporation shall be in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the Governor. This act may be cited as the 'Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.'

"(b) Within 6 months after the close of each fiscal year the Corporation shall make a report to the Congress of the United States, which shall contain the financial statements for the fiscal year, including a balance sheet, a statement of income and expenses for all operations, a statement of income and expenses for major classes of loans, and an analysis of accumulated net income. Such statements shall be prepared from the financial records of the Corporation, which shall be maintained in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles applicable to commercial corporate transactions, including the maintenance of adequate cost accounting records so that the development of data necessary to report the results of its lending activities by major classes of loans can be accomplished. The report shall contain schedules showing, as of the close of the Corporation's fiscal year, direct loans totaling $100,000 or more to any one borrower; loans totaling $100,000 or more to any one borrower in which the Corporation has a participation or an agreement to participate; and the investments in the securities and obligations of any one borrower which total $100,000 or more.

"SEC. 2. The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a Governor appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Governor shall be appointed for a term of 3 years, but he may continue in office until his successor is appointed and qualified. The Governor shall be eligible for reappointment. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of Governor, other than by expiration of term, the person appointed to fill such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired portion of the term. The Governor shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as Governor and shall receive a salary at the rate of $17,500 per annum. The Governor is authorized to appoint two Deputy Governors to assist in the execution of the functions vested in the Corporation. Deputy Governors shall be paid at the rate of $15,000 per annum.

"SEC. 3. (a) The Corporation shall have succession through June 30, 1956, unless it is sooner dissolved by an act of Congress. It shall have power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to lease or purchase such real estate as may be necessary for the transaction of its business; to sue and be sued, to complain and to defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction,

State or Federal; to select, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as shall be necessary for the transaction of the business of the Corporation, in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Classification Act of 1949 and any other laws applicable to the Corporation; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its Governor, bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the manner in which its general business may be conducted. Except as may be otherwise provided in this act or in the Government Corporation Control Act, the Governor of the Corporation shall determine the necessity for and the character and amount of its obligations and expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, paid, and accounted for, without regard to the provisions of any other laws governing the expenditure of public funds, and such determination shall be final and conclusive upon all other officers of the Government. The Corporation shall be entitled to and granted the same immunities and exemptions from the payment of costs, charges, and fees as are granted to the United States pursuant to the provisions of law codified in section 2412 of title 28 of the United States Code. The Corporation shall also be entitled to the use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government. Debts due the Corporation, whether heretofore or hereafter arising, shall not be entitled to the priority available to the United States pursuant to section 3466 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 191) except that the Corporation shall be entitled to such priority with respect to debts arising from any transaction pursuant to any of the following acts or provisions in effect at any time: Sections 5d (1) and 5d (2) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act added by section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of stock of the Federal home-loan banks; to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; and for other purposes,' approved June 25, 1940 (54 Stat. 573); sections 4 (f) and 9 of the act entitled 'An act to mobilize the productive facilities of small business in the interests of successful prosecution of the war, and for other purposes,' approved June 11, 1942 (56 Stat. 354, 356); section 2 (e) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 (56 Stat. 26); the Surplus Property Act of 1944 (58 Stat. 765 and the following); sections 11 and 12 of the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 214, 215); and section 403 of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act (56 Stat. 245).

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the right to recover compensation granted by the act approved September 7, 1916, as amended (5 U. S. C., sec. 751), shall be in lieu of, and shall be construed to abrogate, any and all other rights and remedies which any person, except for this provision, might, on account of injury or death of an employee, assert against the Corporation or any of its subsidiaries.

"SEC. 4. (a) Where it has been determined by the Corporation that financial assistance is not otherwise available on reasonable terms and that a substantial public interest would be served, the Corporation within the limitations hereinafter provided is authorized, either directly or in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions through agreements to participate or by the purchase of participations, or otherwise:

"(1) To purchase the obligations of and to make loans to any business enterprise organized or operating under the laws of any State or the United States.

"(2) To make loans to any financial institution organized under the laws of any State or of the United States and to subscribe for or make loans upon nonassessable preferred stock in any insurance company organized under the laws of any State or of the United States. In any case in which, under the laws of the State in which it is located, any such insurance company is not permitted to issue nonassessable preferred stock, or if such laws permit such issue of preferred stock only by unanimous consent of stockholders, the Corporation is authorized to purchase the legally issued capital notes or debentures of such insurance company.

"(3) In order to aid in financing projects authorized under Federal, State, or municipal law, to purchase the securities and obligations of, or make loans to (A) States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, (B) public agencies and instrumentalities of one or more States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, and (C) public corporations, boards, and commissions: Provided, That no such purchase or loan shall be made for payment of ordinary governmental or nonproject operating expenses as distinguished from purchases and loans to aid in financing specific public projects.

"(4) To make such loans as it may determine to be necessary or appropriate because of floods or other catastrophies: Provided, That the provisions of section 4 (a) as to availability of credit shall not apply to such loans.

"(b) The powers granted in section 4 (a) of this act shall be subject to the following restrictions and limitations:

"(1) All securities and obligations purchased and all loans made under paragraphs (1), (2), and (3), of subsection (a) of this section shall be of such sound value or so secured as reasonably to assure retirement or repayment.

"(2) No loan, including renewals or extensions thereof, may be made under sections 4 (a) (1), (2), and (4) for a period or periods exceeding 10 years and no securities or obligations maturing more than 10 years from date of purchase by the Corporation may be purchased thereunder: Provided, That the foregoing restriction on maturities shall not apply to securities or obligations received by the Corporation as a claimant in bankruptcy or equitable reorganization or as a creditor in proceedings under section 20B of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended: Provided further, That any loan made or securities and obligations purchased prior to July 1, 1947, may in aid of orderly liquidation thereof or the interest of national security, be renewed or the maturity extended for such period not in excess of 10 years and upon such terms as the Corporation may determine: Provided further, That any loan made under section 4 (a) (1) for the purpose of constructing industrial facilities may have a maturity of 10 years plus such additional period as is estimated may be required to complete such construction. The Corporation may, in carrying out the provisions of subsection 4 (a) (3), purchase securities and obligations, or make loans, including renewals or extensions thereof, with maturity dates not in excess of 40 years, as the Corporation may determine.

"(3) In agreements to participate in loans, wherein the Corporation's disbursements are deferred, such participations by the Corporation shall be limited to 70 percent of the balance of the loan outstanding at the time of the disbursement, in those cases where the total amount borrowed is $100,000 or less, and shall be limited to 60 percent of the balance outstanding at the time of disbursement, in those cases where the total amount borrowed is over $100,000.

"(4) The total amount of investments, loans, purchases, and commitments, made pursuant to authority granted by subsections (a) (4), (a) (3), and (a) (2) of section 4, which the Corporation may have outstanding at any one time, shall not exceed (1) under subsection (a) (4) $40,000,000, (2) for construction purposes under subsection (a) (3) $200,000,000, and (3) for financial assistance to insurance companies under subsection (a) (2) $15,000,000.

"(5) No loan or other financial assistance shall be extended under authority contained in 4 (a) (1) unless there is reasonable cause to believe that the total amount of funds supplied including interest thereon can be repaid within 10 years from date of initial disbursement, either from earnings of the borrower or through means, other than liquidation of the borrower, contemplated at the time the application was approved by the Corporation.

"(6) All applications for loans or other financial assistance totaling $100,000 or more to any borrower must be approved by the Governor. In any instance where such an application is approved over the adverse recommendation of the Review Board provided for in paragraph (8) of this subsection, or disapproved over the recommendation of said Board, a memorandum shall be placed in the loan file setting forth the Governor's reasons for such approval or disapproval.

"(7) Each loan made hereafter by the Corporation to any borrower pursuant to paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (a) of this section shall be conditioned upon the execution of an agreement between the Corporation and such borrower by which such borrower shall undertake that it will not, within 2 years after the date of the making of such loan, employ, tender any office or employment to, or retain for professional services any person who on the date such loan was made or within 1 year prior thereto shall have served as a director or Governor of the Corporation, or as an officer, attorney, agent, or employee of the Corporation occupying a position or engaging in activities which the Governor shall have determined to involve the exercise of discretion with respect to the making of loans to borrowers pursuant to paragraph (1) or (2) of subsection (a) of this section unless—

"(A) the Governor shall have determined that such person, on the date such loan was made and within 1 year prior thereto, was employed by the Corporation only in a branch or field office of the Corporation which did not, and under ordinary procedures of the Corporation would not, perform any function in connection with the negotiation, modification, supervision, or collection of such loan; or

"(B) such person (I) shall be employed at the request of the governor upon his determination that such employment is advisable to safeguard the interests of the Corporation, (II) will receive no compensation from the Corporation for such employment other than his regular salary, and (III) will receive no compensation from such borrower for such employment: Provided, That compensation so paid by the Corporation shall be deemed to be nonadministrative expense of the Corporation.

As used in this paragraph, the term 'loan' shall include any extension of financial assistance, by loan or otherwise, pursuant to this act.

"(8) All applications for loans or other financial assistance referred to in paragraph (6) of this subsection shall be reviewed by a Board of Review consisting of five persons selected by the Governor from among the senior examiners of the Corporation. It shall be the duty of the said Board to submit to the Governor a written decision or finding in each case. Each member of the Board shall serve without compensation other than the compensation received as senior examiner and shall not be removed from the said Board without cause.

"(9) No application for a loan or other financial assistance shall be approved by the Corporation unless the basis for the determination of substantial public interest as required by section 4 (a), has been reduced to writing and made a permanent part of the files of the Corporation. The Governor shall make the determination in all cases where the applications total $100,000 or more to any borrower.

"(c) No fee or commission shall be paid by any applicant for financial assistance under the provisions of this act in connection with any such application, and any agreement to pay or payment of any such fee or commission shall be unlawful.

"(d) No Governor, officer, attorney, agent, or employee of the Corporation in any manner, directly or indirectly, shall participate in the deliberation upon or the determination of any question affecting his personal interests, or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

"(e) The powers granted to the Corporation by this section 4 shall terminate at the close of business on June 30, 1954, but the termination of such powers shall not be construed (1) to prohibit disbursement of funds on purchases of securities and obligations, on loans, or on commitments or agreements to make such purchases or loans, made under this act prior to the close of business on such date, or (2) to affect the validity or performance of any other agreement made or entered into pursuant to law.

"(f) The Corporation shall maintain as a permanent part of its records a docket which during the regular business hours of the Corporation shall be kept available for public inspection. The following information shall be posted in the said docket without delay upon receipt of an application for a loan:

"(1) The name of the applicant and, in the case of corporate applicants, the names of the officers and directors thereof.

"(2) The amount and duration of the loan for which application is made.

"(3) The purpose for which the proceeds of the loan are to be used.

"(4) A description of the security offered.

"(5) The names of all persons who shall represent the applicant or who shall intercede for the applicant or who shall attempt to influence the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in any manner either for or against the applicant in the exercise of its judgment in connection with said loan.

Duplicate copies of this docket shall be maintained both in the agency office in which the loan application is filed and in the Washington office of the Corporation.

"(g) In order to enable the Corporation to carry out the provisions of this act, the Treasury Department, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve banks, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board are hereby directed, under such conditions as they may prescribe, to make available to the Corporation at its request such reports, records, or other information as they may have, relating to the condition of existing borrowers and applicants for loans under this act, or relating to obligors whose obligations are offered to or held by the Corporation as security for loans under this act. Every applicant for a loan under this act shall as a condition precedent thereto, consent to such examination as the Corporation may require for the purposes of this act and that reports of examinations by constituted authorities may be furnished by such authorities to the Corporation upon request therefor.

"(h) Section 410 of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, is hereby repealed.

"(i) As used in this act, the term 'State' includes the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 5. It shall be the general policy of the Corporation to establish interest rates on loans that, in the judgment of the Governor, will cover the costs as determined under section 7 (c), administrative expenses and other expenses, and a risk factor which, over all will provide for losses that may materialize on loans.

"SEC. 6. The Federal Reserve banks are authorized and directed to act as custodians and fiscal agents for the Corporation in the general performance of its powers conferred by this act and the Corporation may reimburse such Federal Reserve banks for such services in such manner as may be agreed upon.

"SEC. 7. (a) The Corporation is authorized to obtain money from the Treasury of the United States, for use in the performance of the functions, powers, and duties granted to or imposed upon it by this act or any other provision of law, not to exceed a total of $1,300,000,000 outstanding at any one time. For this purpose appropriations not to exceed $1,300,000,000 are hereby authorized. Amounts appropriated hereunder and all income hereafter earned from the Corporation's operations shall become and will be administered as a revolving fund to effectuate the provisions of this act. Advances shall be made to the Corporation from the revolving fund upon the written request of the Corporation. As the Corporation repays the amounts obtained from the Treasury, the repayments shall be made to the revolving fund.

"(b) Within 30 days after the appropriations authorized in section 7 (a) have been made available, the Corporation shall retire its capital stock, shall redeem its outstanding notes held by the Treasury, and shall pay into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury the estimated amount of its accumulated earnings as of the date of settlement. Necessary adjustment arising from earnings redetermination shall be made within a reasonable time thereafter. The Corporation's power to issue its notes, debentures, bonds, and other obligations to the United States Treasury, except as provided under section 7 (a), is hereby rescinded.

"(c) Annual payments shall be made by the Corporation to the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts by reason of costs incured by the Government, either directly or indirectly, through the employment of Federal funds by the Corporation in carrying out the provisions of this act. These payments shall be computed by applying to the average monthly balance of funds invested in the Corporation, a percentage determined annually in advance by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such percentage shall not be less than the current average rate which the Treasury pays on its marketable obligations.

"SEC. 8. The Corporation shall after June 30, 1950, contribute to the civil-service retirement and disability fund, on the basis of annual billings as determined by the Civil Service Commission, for the Government's share of the cost of the civil-service retirement system applicable to the Corporation's employees and their beneficiaries. The Corporation shall also after June 30, 1950, contribute to the Employees' Compensation Fund, on the basis of annual billings as determined by the Federal Security Administrator for the benefit payments made from such fund on account of the Corporation's employees. The annual billings shall also include a statement of the fair portion of the cost of the administration of the respective funds, which shall be paid by the Corporation into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 9. The Corporation, including its franchise, capital, reserves and surplus, and its income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to special assessments for local improvements and shall be subject to State, Territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed. The exemptions provided for in the preceding sentence with respect to taxation (which shall, for all purposes, be deemed to include sales, use, storage, and purchase taxes) shall be construed to be applicable not only with respect to the Corporation but also with respect to any other public corporation which is now or which may be hereafter wholly financed and wholly managed by the Corporation. Such exemptions shall also be construed to be applicable to loans made, and personal property owned by the Corporation, or such other corporations, but such exemptions shall not be construed to be applicable in any State to any buildings which are considered by the laws of such State to be personal property for taxation purposes. Notwithstanding any other provision of law or any privilege or consent to tax expressly or impliedly granted thereby, the shares of preferred stock of national banking associations, and the shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of State banks and trust companies, acquired prior to July 1, 1947, by the Corporation, and the dividends or interest derived therefrom by the Corporation, shall not, so long as the Corporation shall continue to own the same, be subject to any taxation by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or the District of Columbia, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, whether now, heretofore, or hereafter imposed, levied, or assessed, and whether for a past, present, or future taxing period.

"SEC. 10. (a) The Corporation is authorized and directed to transfer within 30 days after the effective date of this act, to the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and the Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized and directed to receive, all notes, mortgages, debentures, loan agreements, or other forms of indebtedness, and all loan files pertaining to the loan to the Republic of the Philippines and the loan to the Steep Rock Iron Mines, Ltd. The Export-Import Bank shall reimburse the Corporation for the unpaid balances of the loans, plus accrued interest, as of the date of transfer.

"(b) The Corporation is authorized and directed to transfer within 30 days after the effective date of this act, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive, all notes, loan agreements, or other forms of indebtedness, and all loan files pertaining to the loan to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cancel notes of the Corporation in an amount equal to the unpaid balance of the loan, plus accrued interest, as of the date of transfer.

"(c) The Corporation is authorized and directed to transfer within 30 days after the effective date of this act, to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized and directed to receive, all mortgages, so classified on the Corporation's balance sheet, which originated under authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Mortgage Company. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cancel notes of the Corporation in an amount equal to the unpaid balances of the mortgages, plus accrued interest, as of the date of transfer. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall sell or otherwise liquidate the mortgages so transferred at no less than the unpaid balance at date of transaction, plus accrued interest. All income and proceeds from liquidation, less reasonable costs of administration, shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 11. Upon the termination of the powers granted to the Corporation by section 4 of this act, the Governor shall, except as otherwise herein specifically authorized, proceed to liquidate its assets and wind up its affairs. He may with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury deposit with the Treasurer of the United States as a special fund any money belonging to the Corporation or from time to time received by it in the course of liquidation, for the payment of its outstanding obligations, which fund may be drawn upon or paid out for no other purpose. Any balance remaining after the liquidation of all the Corporation's assets and after provision has been made for payment of all legal obligations shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. Thereupon the Corporation shall be dissolved.

"SEC. 12. If at the expiration of the succession of the Corporation, its Governor shall not have completed the liquidation of its assets and the winding up of its affairs, the duty of completing such liquidation and winding up of its affairs shall be transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury, who for such purpose shall succeed to all the powers and duties of the Governor under this act. In such event he may assign to any officer or officers of the United States in the Treasury Department the exercise and performance, under his general supervision and direction, of any such powers and duties. When the Secretary of the Treasury shall find that such liquidation will no longer be advantageous to the United States and that all of the Corporation's legal obligations have been provided for, he shall pay into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts the unused balance of the moneys belonging to the Corporation, and make a final report to the Congress. Thereupon the Corporation shall be deemed to be dissolved.

"SEC. 13. (a) Whoever makes any statement knowing it to be false, or whoever willfully overvalues any security, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for any applicant any loan, or extension thereof by removal, deferment of action or otherwise, or the acceptance, release, or substitution of security therefor, or for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of the Corporation, or for the purpose of obtaining money, property, or anything of value, under this act, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

"(b) Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, in imitation of or purporting to be a note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued by the Corporation; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish any false, forged, or counterfeited note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, purporting to have been issued by the Corporation, knowing the same to be false, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued or purporting to have been issued by the Corporation; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish, as true any falsely altered or spurious note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued or purporting to have been issued by the Corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, or any person who willfully violates any other provision of this act, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

"(c) Whoever, being connected in any capacity with the Corporation, (1) embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, securities, or other things of value, whether belonging to it or pledged or otherwise entrusted to it; or (2) with intent to defraud the Corporation or any other body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer, auditor, or examiner of the Corporation, makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of or to the Corporation, or without being duly authorized, draws any orders or issues, puts forth, or assigns any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof; or (3) with intent to defraud participates, shares, receives directly or indirectly any money, profit, property, or benefit through any transaction, loan, commission, contract, or any other act of the Corporation; or (4) gives any unauthorized information concerning any future action or plan of the Corporation which might affect the value of securities, or having such knowledge, invests or speculates, directly or indirectly, in the securities or property of any company, bank, or corporation receiving loans or other assistance from the Corporation, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

"(d) No individual, association, partnership, or corporation shall use the words 'Reconstruction Finance Corporation' or a combination of these three words, as the name or a part thereof under which he or it shall do business. Every individual, partnership, association, or corporation violating this prohibition shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or both.

"SEC. 14. The Corporation is authorized to exercise the functions, powers, duties, and authority transferred to the Corporation by Public Law 109, Seventy-ninth Congress, approved June 30, 1945, but only with respect to programs, projects, or commitments outstanding on June 30, 1947.

"SEC. 15. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person, or circumstances shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this act, and the applicability of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 60 days after the date of its enactment, and the offices, powers, and duties of the Board of Directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall thereupon terminate.

The statement presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT

REVISION OF THE RFC ACT

This bill proposes a number of changes designed to strengthen the RFC Act by clarifying the Corporation's responsibilities and by improving its accounting methods and its financial structure. The bill has the further aim of strengthening the control which the people of the United States exercise through the Congress over the lending of public moneys to private individuals and business concerns.

The principal change proposed by this bill is the substitution of a single Governor for the present Board of Directors of the Corporation and the elimination of that Board. This is the same change proposed in the separate bill which I have introduced today. I will not repeat my discussion of the reasons why this change is proposed.

The present bill seeks to strengthen the control over the activities of RFC by clarifying the responsibilities of the Corporation in three important respects. It eliminates those provisions of the present act under which the Corporation is enabled to share its responsibility for certain specific loans with other agencies of the Government, it reclassifies one important limitation imposed by the present act so as to clearly require that it be observed as a condition precedent to lending, and it imposes one new requirement as a condition precedent to the exercise of the lending power.

Under the present RFC Act the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the approval of the Civil Aeronautics Board are required before the RFC can finally approve the making of loans to railroads and air carriers. The Civil Aeronautics Board is required by its organic legislation to accept the responsibility of granting such approvals. These circumstances impose on the Board the occasional necessity that it make decisions which cannot possibly be objective decisions. If the Board has approved an RFC loan to a specific carrier it can scarcely avoid the granting of a sufficient subsidy to assure that the loan can be repaid.

This bill eliminates the requirement for ICC or CAB approval of RFC loans and in this way it imposes on the Governor of RFC, without qualification, the full responsibility for any and all loans made by the Corporation.

The bill also eliminates the requirement that the Secretary of the Treasury make certain certifications in connection with RFC loans to insurance companies.

In order to provide that the Corporation will not be deprived of useful or necessary information by these changes, the bill contains a new subsection under which RFC is granted access to reports, records, and other information which may be in the possession of certain agencies of the Government, and which may relate to the condition of existing borrowers or applicants for RFC loans.

In order to clarify the responsibility which the Corporation must accept when it makes a loan, the bill proposes a restatement of the grant of lending authority. It proposes that the Corporation be empowered to lend public money only where it has first been determined by the Corporation that financial assistance is not otherwise available on reasonable terms and that a substantial public interest would be served.

The requirement that financial assistance be not otherwise available is stated as a limitation on the lending authority in the present act. By its inclusion in the language which grants the authority this bill seeks to emphasize and thus to enhance the significance of the limitation by clearly making it a condition precedent to the exercise of the authority. The limitation has been accorded inadequate recognition in the operations of the Corporation in recent periods.

The present RFC Act does not require the Corporation to determine that a substantial public interest would be served by the making of any individual loan. During the hearings which were held by the subcommittee on RFC in 1950, it became apparent that no great efforts were being made by the Corporation or by its Board of Directors to ascertain that a genuine public interest was served by the loans which were made. Many important loans have been made, in my opinion, in complete disregard of the public interest.

The $15,000,000 loan to Texmass Petroleum Co. was found by the subcommittee to be in disregard of the public interest. The loan to the Mapes Hotel in Reno, repayable in large measure from the earnings of a gambling casino, was made in clear disregard of the public interest. The loan to Waltham Watch Co., under certain circumstances, might have been a loan which furthered the public interest, but under the conditions which were established in the loan agreement, it could not even assist the borrower, let alone the public. The conditions under which the loan to Waltham Watch Co. were made virtually assured the company that it would fail.

The RFC has under consideration at the present time a $12,000,000 loan application which seeks to finance the construction of a privately owned subterranean garage under the Boston Common. There has been considerable controversy about the public interest in this project, and there has even been controversy about its economic feasibility. Most recently the main argument in favor of the loan has been that a garage under the Boston Common would provide an excellent shelter in the event of atomic bombing. The counterargument has been that such a garage would never have less than 40,000 gallons of gasoline in its storage tanks or in the tanks of the parked automobiles, a circumstance which might interfere seriously with the use of the garage as a shelter in a bombing raid. Certainly the public interest in this loan has not yet been established.

It is for these reasons that the bill proposes to require a specific determination by the Corporation that each loan made will serve a substantial public interest. Separately, the bill requires that the basis for such a determination be reduced to writing so that the records of the Corporation will contain a clear exposition of the reasoning which prompted the making of the loan. Such a record is necessary if the committees of the Congress are to have a satisfactory accounting from the RFC in hearings held weeks after the loans are made. It should prove useful also in the annual audits made for the Congress by the Comptroller General of the United States.

In order to clarify the responsibility of the Corporation's Governor, the bill proposes to require that the Governor shall approve all loans in excess of $100,000. It proposes to require further that in those instances in which the Governor either grants a loan or denies it, against the recommendation of the Corporation's review board, he must record in writing his reasons for doing so.

The Subcommittee on RFC has been amazed to learn that many of the loans made by the RFC in the past 2 years have been made by the Board over the strong objection of its advisers and without the creation of any record of the reasons why the advisers were overruled. The testimony given by Board members in later justification of such acts has been unconvincing in every important instance. The requirement now proposed should bring about a considerable improvement at the highest level in accounting for the business decisions of RFC.

The performance of the present review committee associated with the RFC office in Washington has been most encouraging to me and to the other members of the Subcommittee on RFC. The review committee is composed of five of the most seasoned loan examiners of the RFC. They have shown integrity and independence to an exceedingly high degree and they have shown it consistently under circumstances which must to them have been most discouraging.

The members of the Subcommittee on RFC have seen fit to commend these men in public hearings on a number of occasions for the courage with which they have performed their duties. So that the Members of Congress may know who they are, I would like to read into the record the names of the five senior examiners who have made up the RFC review committee during the past 2 years. They are George P. Luce, chairman; Joseph C. Kitt, vice chairman; Frank T. Ronan, Thomas E. Parks, R. Goodwyn Rhett, Jr.

The review committee was created by the RFC many years ago. In recognition of its value, and to make certain that its independence shall not be impaired by the events of any future period, the bill proposes that the continued existence of the review committee be required by statute.

Another provision which will clarify the scope of the Corporation's lending authority is one which refers to the maximum maturity for the repayment of RFC loans. Under the existing law the Corporation may make business loans for a period of 10 years and no longer. The clear intent of this provision was that the Government wished not to place the resources of the public at the disposal of private individuals or private enterprises for more than 10 years in any one instance. But the law has not been interpreted in this way.

The $15,000,000 loan to Texmass Petroleum Co. was earmarked to the extent of about 81 percent for the repayment of existing debt. It was a bail-out, and except for the fact that it eased the debt repayment terms which then existed, it added little to the borrower's repayment ability. In the opinion of expert geologists, the circumstances in which the borrower found himself were such as to preclude repayment of the loan in the 10-year period provided by the resolution of RFC Board of Directors.

Counsel for RFC advised the Senate subcommittee that under the law it was not necessary for the Corporation to determine how the loan would be repaid. Repayment by liquidation of the borrower's enterprise at the end of the 10-year period, in the opinion of the counsel, would meet the requirements of the present RFC Act. The requirements would be met also if the repayment were made from the proceeds of a new loan negotiated at the end of 10 years even if the new loan should be an RFC loan.

This bill proposes that loans shall not be made unless there is reasonable cause to believe that they can be paid with interest within 10 years, either from the borrower's earnings or through other means, excluding liquidation, contemplated at the time the RFC loan was approved. This provision imposes no hardship. It would merely require that the plans of financing in which the Corporation engages be complete and orderly plans, and not haphazard plans based on the hope that unforeseen circumstances will ward off future problems. This should strengthen congressional control over RFC.

Another provision of this bill which will strengthen the control over RFC is the provision that there be a public docket of loan applications. This docket will be available for public inspection during the Corporation's regular business hours, both in Washington and in other cities in which the Corporation maintains offices. Without delay, upon receipt of applications, the Corporation would be required to post in this docket:

1. The name of the applicant, and, in the case of corporations, the names of officers and directors.

2. The amount and duration of the loan applied for.

3. The purpose for which the money is to be used.

4. A description of the security offered.

5. The names of all persons who shall represent the applicant, or who shall intercede for him, or who shall attempt to influence the RFC in any manner in the exercise of its judgment in connection with the application.

In 1949 RFC lent $44,000,000 to Kaiser-Frazer Corp. after protracted secret negotiations. After the loan had been made there was considerable controversy about it, and the public interest which it served was seriously questioned. It would have been helpful to the RFC directors if the arguments pro and con had been at its disposal when the loan was under consideration. Early in December 1950, an additional $25,000,000 loan was made to Kaiser-Frazer Corp. The negotiations for this additional loan were also conducted in secret until the point had been reached at which public discussion could add little value to the negotiations. This loan was crammed through the RFC in the final days of negotiation with great confusion and little objective argument. One of the principle arguments for the new $25,000,000 investment was the contention that it improved the quality of the existing $44,000,000 investment. This is a process which could go on indefinitely.

The provision regarding the publication of names of intermediaries is aimed at discouraging the growth of undue influence in the hands of favored parties. The application of this provision should greatly strengthen the hand of the Governor of RFC and make it possible for him to maintain the Corporation's integrity and independence.

The bill contains a new section which will prohibit the employment of RFC people by borrowers within 2 years after the borrowers have obtained financial assistance from the RFC. There have been a number of instances recently in which RFC officials have accepted employment under very attractive terms with borrowers who might not have been able to obtain their loans had it not been for the efforts of these people.

Mr. John Hagerty took a $30,000-a-year job as agent for the trustees of Waltham Watch Co. less than a week after the final negotiation of the conditions on which the RFC loan to Waltham was made. Mr. Allen Freeze recently took a $25,000-a-year job as vice president of Texmass Petroleum Co. This was done as soon as possible after completion of negotiations of the RFC loan to Texmass. In Mr. Freeze's case employment was delayed considerably by the reluctance of the directors to give it their approval. Although Freeze was employed in the office of the RFC controller and therefore had no official connection in the lending activity, he was nevertheless very active in connection with the loan application and, particularly, with the preparation of material offered by RFC in justification of its decision to make the loan.

A bill to enact the prohibitions proposed in this bill was submitted to the Senate as S. 1871 on July 11, 1949. It was adopted by the Senate but failed to receive the approval of the House of Representatives.

This bill proposes a substantial revision in the financial structure of RFC. At the present time RFC has a capital fund of $100,000,000 provided by the Treasury and it has the authority to borrow whatever other moneys are required. It has always had borrowing authority. In response to a recommendation made repeatedly by the Comptroller General of the United States, and in response to the same recommendation made by the Hoover Commission Task Force on Federal Lending, this bill proposes to eliminate the capital fund and to terminate the borrowing authority. The Corporation would be financed, instead, by a revolving fund placed at its disposal by appropriations. This fund would be held by the Treasury and moneys would be advanced to the Corporation from it as requested.

Under this bill the Corporation would repay its present capital and borrowings as soon as the revolving fund would become available. In recognition of the costs incurred by the Treasury in making the funds available, the Corporation would make annual payments determined by applying an interest rate to the average monthly balance invested in the Corporation.

The bill does not refer to these payments as interest payments, but rather it considers them to be payments made in recognition of the Government's costs. Under this provision the operations of RFC would receive a full charge for all costs incurred by the Government in borrowing the money for RFC's use.

In response to another recommendation by the Comptroller General of the United States the bill contains a provision which would require RFC to pay the costs incurred by the Government in providing civil-service retirement fund benefits for RFC employees. There is no such requirement in the present law.

Discretion over interest rates on RFC loans is vested in the Governor by the provisions of this bill. It has been vested in the Board of Directors. To assist the Governor in determining the rates of interest which should be charged on RFC loans, there has been included in this bill a provision which lays down the general policy that interest rates on RFC loans should be sufficient to provide revenue which will cover the cost of money, the expenses of administration, and a risk factor which over all will provide for losses that may materialize on loans.

The Banking and Currency Committee on previous occasions has considered including in the RFC Act a policy statement which like this one would indicate that the Corporation should operate on a self-sustaining basis. Its operations have not been self-sustaining in recent periods.

Certain loans and mortgages now held by RFC would be transferred to other agencies of the Government under the provision of section 10 of this bill. A loan of $60,000,000 to the Republic of the Philippines would be transferred to the Export-Import Bank of Washington because the Export-Import Bank has excellent facilities for servicing this loan and because the loan is a freak in the portfolio at RFC. The remainder of a loan of $5,000,000 to Steep Rock Iron Mines, Ltd., of Ontario, Canada, would also be transferred to the Export-Import Bank. This transfer is proposed because the bank already has a loan to this corporation and it seems desirable that the RFC loan be combined with it so that the entire arrangement may be administered as a unit. The Export-Import Bank is better qualified than the RFC for administration of a loan to a foreign borrower.

Under section 10 (b) of the bill, the loan to the Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland would be transferred for collection to the Secretary of the Treasury. If this and the other transfers proposed by section 10 were made, the portfolio of RFC would contain only domestic loans and no foreign loans. This seems desirable since the Corporation now has no authority to make loans to other than domestic borrowers.

The provisions of section 10 (c) would transfer certain mortgages to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. These mortgages are similar in every respect to the mortgages which were transferred to the Housing and Home Finance Agency in September 1950, under the provision of a reorganization plan. The effect of this provision would be to eliminate a duplication of activity as between the RFC and the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, FOREIGN POLICY, AND THE WAR IN KOREA

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the comprehensive discussions of international affairs, of what we term "foreign policy," and of the war in Korea, now taking place in this body, are unquestionably appropriate and timely. In fact, such discussions are long overdue.

This debate may well prove to be prophetic and historic. It holds promise of producing wholesome and beneficial results. I am sure benefits will flow from it and good will come of it if those of us who participate in it will lay aside all partisan considerations.

The dangers that are inherent in and associated with the philosophy and ideology of communism and the brutal aggression now being pursued by the evil and barbaric dictators present the gravest challenge the free people of the world have even known. Our liberties, our freedom, and every vestige of our priceless heritage are in peril. If we fail to measure up to our responsibilities and opportunities, as a Government and as a free people, to meet it and defeat it, and destroy the monstrous forces that have fomented and created this danger, we cannot expect to long survive. The ultimate is: We shall live, or we shall perish.

With reliance upon Divine Providence for wisdom and guidance, with the application of sober, intelligent thought and deliberation, and with a spirit and willingness to make every sacrifice the exigencies of this crisis may demand, I have a profound faith that we can and will come through the dark era of the present and the bloody and soul-rending days, and maybe years, ahead of us, strong, undefeated, and with a crushing victory over the abominable forces of slavery and conquest.

To survive, to maintain our independence, to remain free, to preserve our traditional liberties, and to win through to victory, by peaceful means if possible, but by mortal military combat if we must, transcend in values and in importance all of the material possessions of our Nation and of all the peoples of the earth, including life itself. It is our profound and solemn duty as Members of this Senate, Mr. President, just as it is that of the President of the United States and of every public servant of our Government, to strive with all of our intellect and all of our moral and spiritual strength during this crisis to ascend to the fullest heights of patriotism and statesmanship of which we are capable.

Mr. President, it is in that spirit, and with that hope and purpose that I undertake to discuss briefly some of the grave problems that confront us, to offer some suggestions, and to propose that certain actions be taken by this body.

I was very much heartened, Mr. President, by that part of the President's message January 8, on the state of the Union, in which he appealed for unity. The President made it perfectly clear that he did not mean unity in the sense of unanimity—in that everyone should agree with everyone else about everything, but rather that, with an abiding sense of individual responsibility and effort, and with free and open debate in which we weigh our words and actions, we arrive at and make decisions that represent the collective will and judgment of the Congress and of the American people. To that end then we must work together in unity and strength by the means decided upon and that are determined should be employed to achieve our common goal.

In a democracy, under our form of government, proposals, policies, and programs of our Government when presented should be, and as a matter of right are, not only subject to scrutiny and debate, but should be exposed to fair and proper criticism—preferably, of course, constructive criticism that may be helpful rather than harmful, but harmful, at least temporarily, if it must be, and if that is necessary, to prevent tragic or fatal mistakes.

Therefore, I propose, at this time, and at all appropriate times hereafter, to express my views on vital issues, make what I believe and hope will be constructive suggestions, and make, if proper, such criticisms as, in my humble judgment, the occasion and the circumstances warrant.

First, Mr. President, why are we now fighting in Korea? There are still many Americans who do not clearly understand our mission there or just what we are fighting for. I think it may be said that we are primarily there because we are members of the United Nations and are undertaking to carry out our obligation and commitments under the Charter of the United Nations to oppose aggression and to preserve peace. Except for that obligation, Mr. President, and the implications of the North Korean invasion of South Korea, as an incident in international affairs that is calculated, if unchecked, to spread into a world conflagration, there could be no justification, and we should not be warranted in committing our Armed Forces to combat in that area.

Whatever may have been our appraisal of the North Korean invasion action at the time it occurred, whether that appraisal was accurate or whether we misjudged the full scope and purpose of the action, the presence and fighting of our troops in Korea has long since ceased to be what it was first termed to be—a mere police action.

Clothed as we are with the authority and sanction of the United Nations, so long as our mission and purpose was to repel the invading North Koreans and restore peace and order to Korea, the term "police action" may have had some appearance of validity. But when that mission was nearing completion and Red China openly intervened and entered the conflict on the side of the Communist Korea aggressor and attacked the United Nations troops, any remaining semblance of its being only a police action to preserve the peace completely dissolved. Such a position or contention is no longer tenable. So let us call it what it is, Mr. President. It is war—not a declared war under our constitutional processes, but it is in truth war in every concept of the word.

The United States is now—today—at war with Red China. To attempt to name or call it something else, or to treat it as something else, will be a snare and a delusion. Such an attempt at self-deception will be of no comfort to the fathers and mothers of sons and wives whose husbands are now fighting and dying over there under the American flag and the flag of the United Nations. They know differently. And if we so act and conduct ourselves as to lend credence to such false pretense, we shall be committing an unpardonable betrayal of every soldier in Korea.

Although we know it is war, there are those who still insist that a peaceful or negotiated settlement of this conflict is still possible of achievement by and through the framework and authority of the United Nations. Any prospect or hope of an honorable solution and a cease-fire order with a restoration of peace through the efforts of the United Nations, if any at all, grows dimmer day by day. To entertain any hope that permanent solution can or will be found through that process requires a microscopic inspection with a long stretch of the imagination.

I do not mean to imply that we should not continue to explore and to follow to the end of the road all honorable means available to us through the United Nations, or otherwise, to bring about a stop to this conflagration. We should and we will do so. But we cannot long continue some of our present policies without inviting disaster. We are at war. We must be governed accordingly and square our conduct and actions in Congress and as a government with that stark reality.

Since we are at war with Red China, I can see no rational justification for our fighting a limited war against this powerful foe. And, Mr. President we are doing just that.

Many of our allies, members of the United Nations who supported and acquiesced in this intervention in Korea, still continue to do business as usual with the Red Chinese Government. They accord full diplomatic recognition of her government and continue to supply her, through channels of trade, with many vital materials and supplies that serve and strengthen her war effort. Such action, Mr. President, gives vital aid to the enemy and enables her armed hordes to kill more and more American boys. Such a course is a dishonor to the purposes for which the United Nations was created, and our Government should not only protest this double dealing of those who are offenders but we should demand of the United Nations that all-out sanctions be invoked under the authority of the United Nations Charter.

Mr. President, we should fight this war with other things besides bullets and American boys. Every economic measure and weapon at the disposal of, and available to, the United Nations and our allies should be employed and applied in all their force and power without further quibbling or delay.

The hands of our own Government are not clean on that score. We have refused and still refuse to let our forces fight on Chinese soil. We will not permit our planes to pursue enemy combat planes across the Korea-Manchuria border after they have invaded Korea and attacked us. We have not permitted, and still do not permit, our planes to attack and bomb heavy concentrations of troops, supply depots, and military installations in China. Why are these so sacred and untouchable? The lives of our boys and the worthiness of our objectives forbid and repudiate this character of base timidity which either clearly indicates a lack of courage and vision on the part of our own Government, or it is convincing evidence that our Government is fighting this war half-heartedly and apologetically. This must stop, Mr. President, if we desire or expect the American people whole-heartedly to unite behind our leaders in this war effort.

We are fighting under the banner of the United Nations. On June 25, 1950, the day following the invasion of South Korea by the forces of North Korea, our Government, through our representatives on the Security Council, brought before the Council the report from the United Nations Commission on Korea which confirmed the attack. And because this assault upon the Republic of South Korea was held to be an act of aggression, the United Nations adopted a resolution, by a vote of 9 to 0, which determined that the attack upon the Republic of Korea constituted a breach of the peace and called for, first, the immediate cessation of hostilities, and second, the withdrawal of North Korean forces to the thirty-eighth parallel. Throughout June 26 the invaders continued their attack, disregarding and flouting the resolution and action of the Security Council of the United Nations.

On June 27, the United Nations Security Council met again and passed a second resolution, recommending that members of the United Nations furnish to the Republic of Korea such aid as might be necessary to meet the attacks then being made upon that nation. This resolution was adopted by a vote of 7 to 1. Pursuant to that action by the Security Council, the President of the United States announced on June 30 that he had authorized the United States Air Force to conduct missions on specific military targets in North Korea and had ordered a naval blockade of the entire Korean coast. That raises this question, Mr. President: We thought it advisable to blockade the Korean coast immediately that we undertook to give assistance to South Korea. Why are not we taking the same action against Red China, a far more powerful and dangerous foe?

Thereafter, our ground forces were dispatched to Korea. They have been fighting there ever since.

Subsequently, fifty-odd Members gave evidence of their support of the United Nations in attempting to restore peace in Korea. On July 19, the President, in his message to Congress, after detailing the events that had transpired between June 25 and that date, stated, among other things, when referring to the fighting in Korea:

> It should be made perfectly clear that the action was taken as a matter of basic moral principle.

Mr. President, I understand that is the basis upon which we are acting, namely, the basis of moral principle.

I quote further:

> The United States was going to the aid of a nation established and supported by the United Nations and unjustifiably attacked by an aggressor force.

There can be no doubt, Mr. President, that our Government has acted in accordance with the Charter obligations of the United Nations which we have assumed. The obligations of other members of the United Nations correspond with our own. It is just as much their duty to uphold and defend the principles of the United Nations as it is our duty to do so. It is just as much their duty, within the limits of their capabilities, to provide soldiers, armaments, and supplies, and to fight against any aggressor, and to do so in this immediate conflict, as it is our duty to do so.

But, Mr. President, the hard and disillusioning facts are, and the truth is, that some members of the United Nations have woefully shirked that responsibility. They have not kept faith. As I see it, they are repudiating the solemn pledge of the Charter to which they subscribed.

Partially as a result of their failure to meet their obligation, we, who have undertaken to meet ours, now find ourselves in a desperate situation. Our forces in Korea are now confronted by overwhelming numbers of Red Chinese Communist troops supplied and equipped by Red Russia, who inspired and instigated this conflict and who, without a shadow of a doubt, is today directing the military strategy and tactics of Red China and North Korea in this war. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, we have carried, and are now being compelled to carry, 90 percent of the burden of the cost, of the fighting, and of the sacrifices and suffering that present and past resistance to this aggression have entailed.

The American people are asking—at least my constituents want to know—why our Government and the United Nations do not permit the Nationalist forces under Chiang Kai-shek to fight with us in Korea. I want to know why, Mr. President, and every soldier in Korea should be told why, if it is at all possible for any plausible excuse to be given.

I know that prior to Red China's entering the conflict openly, the argument was made that Red China would resent the use of Nationalist Chinese forces by the United Nations, and might thus be provoked to support and fight with the North Koreans. Mr. President, without any such provocation, the Red Chinese Communists now are fighting with the North Koreans. So such an argument no longer is tenable. Red China is now in the fray and is slaughtering American sons by the hundreds and thousands day by day.

Another question the American people are asking, Mr. President—a question my constituents are asking—is why we are fighting a limited or restricted war against Red China. Why is our Air Force shackled? Why is it not permitted to bomb the military installations, the supply lines, and depots in Manchuria? Why is Chinese soil so sacred that it should be immune from attack, while our Government demands and exacts the supreme sacrifice of American sons on the soil of Korea while fighting against the Communist hordes of an aggressor Red China? Mr. President, I protest our fighting a limited war against Red China. We owe it to our fighting men in Korea and to our people here at home to fight China with everything we have, by using every weapon of war at our command, and by striking and destroying all military targets and installations on her soil that are within reach of our striking powers.

Mr. President, I make bold to suggest that if our Government, the commander in chief of our Armed Forces, and the United Nations shall longer persist in our fighting a limited war against China, and in refusing to permit the Nationalist Chinese, whose government is a member of the United Nations, to fight with us; and if they continue to insist on our fighting a limited war by shackling our Air Force and refusing its permission to strike at, bomb, and destroy the military targets, installations, and supply depots in China, then we should remove our troops from Korea in the quickest and safest way possible. As I see it, this is either war that calls for fighting with all we have, with all the power and force the United Nations can command, or what we have done is to commit a vain and stupendous blunder; and history will so record it.

Mr. President, debate and an exchange of views on vital issues is an important factor in our democratic processes. But prolonged discussions without reaching any decisions and taking actions to implement and carry out the will of this body and that of the Congress, will not suffice in this crisis. It will avail but little. If the United States Senate really wants to meet and discharge its constitutional responsibilities and bring its influence to bear on foreign policy and international affairs, we must do more than merely debate and talk. We must also act within our constitutional prerogatives and authority.

I therefore propose that the Senate begin taking affirmative action on some of these vital issues which are directly related to the war in Korea and involved in the foreign policy of our Government.

To that end, and for that purpose, at the close of my remarks I shall submit three Senate resolutions which will, if adopted, give emphatic expression to the will and judgment of this body.

The first of these resolutions will declare that it is the sense of the United States Senate that Red China is an aggressor in the war in Korea. The second will declare that it is the sense of the United States Senate that the Government of Red China should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations. The third will declare that it is the sense of the United States Senate that the United Nations should immediately invoke and exercise all its powers under chapter VII, articles 41, 42, and 43 of the United Nations Charter, including economic sanctions and a complete blockade of all communications with, and transportation to, Red China.

Regarding my first proposal that Red China shall be declared an aggressor, I only wish to say that if she is not an aggressor and should not be declared to be such by the United Nations, then we have no business being at war with her and should immediately withdraw our forces from Korea. If Red China is not an aggressor under the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter, then neither is North Korea, and we have no business fighting either of them.

Regarding my second proposal, if Red China is an aggressor, she is not eligible for membership in the United Nations. The Charter provides in chapter II, article 4, that only peace-loving states are eligible for membership. Is an aggressor nation with whom we and the United Nations are now at war a peace-loving nation under the terms of the Charter? Not even a fool would answer that in the affirmative. The day that the Communist government of China is granted membership in the United Nations—that will be another day of infamy in world history. Such action would be a prostitution of every ideal inherent in the basic purposes and principles of this international organization, which is dedicated to peace and justice among the nations of the world. When Red China walks in, common decency, integrity, and self-respect should compel us to walk out.

My third proposal with reference to economic sanctions and blockade speaks for itself. We have committed to battle in this conflict hundreds of thousands of American boys. Thousands have already made the supreme sacrifice; others are dying while I speak. Mr. President, if we and the United Nations do not employ and make full use of every power and weapon available to us to support and protect our soldiers in this war effort, in my judgment we shall be guilty of betraying the valiancy, the heroism, and the sacrifices of our troops in Korea. Not to use all means available to us, including economic sanctions, blockade, and every weapon at our disposal, constitutes an international crime against freedom and justice, whose cause we espouse, and under whose banner we are fighting in Korea today.

I earnestly hope the Senate will give immediate consideration to these resolutions, and that they will receive the enthusiastic support of every Member of this body.

I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolutions to which I have referred, and I ask that they lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolutions will be received and lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. MCCLELLAN and ordered to lie on the table are as follows:

Senate Resolution 35

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

Senate Resolution 36

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Communist China should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations.

Senate Resolution 37

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately take such measures against Communist China under chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations as will be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security, including the application by members of the United Nations of measures for the complete interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, the severance of diplomatic relations, and operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations.

ATLANTIC UNION

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, we have listened to the thoughtful and eloquent address of the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas. We recall that yesterday the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] submitted the Atlantic Union concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) in which the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and I joined, along with the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from California [Mr. NIXON], the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. President, I should like at this time to address myself to the Atlantic Union resolution and state what I conceive to be cogent reasons for its adoption.

I am sure we have all noted with satisfaction the enthusiastic reception accorded by the Atlantic Treaty nations to General Eisenhower as he enters upon the responsibilities of his historic mission.

The general is looked upon by these democratic peoples with whom we have stood side by side in former perils as a true and trusted friend, and they welcome him as such. They see him come across the ocean to give again of his genius and the buoyancy of his humanitarian spirit to the preparation against another great danger. As the representative of the United States, he symbolizes to these peoples who share with us a common heritage, the humanity, the courage, the strength, and the fundamental unity of the American people. He personifies their own aspirations for peace and contentment in a free world.

The renewed confidence which this great soldier-statesman and his mission have inspired in the hearts of our friends of the western democracies is of signal value to the ultimate success of the enterprise in which we are jointly engaged. The President's restatement of our country's determination to stand with all free nations in the common fight against Communist aggression has further bolstered this confidence and strengthened General Eisenhower in his task. The circumstances augur well for the attainment of the goals which we have set for ourselves.

History will record the magnificence of the adventures of the United Nations, the Marshall plan, and the Atlantic Pact. Whatever the degree of their success they will take their place with the other great advancements in the uncertain course of human progress, and God will bless us for the effort.

I attribute the success thus far achieved in the pursuit of these experiments as much as anything else to the requisite bringing together of nations with their sheafs of troubles around the council table. Nations that have maintained an age-old aloofness and preserved old rivalries have under the leavening of common peril, discovered their interdependence. Around these council tables they have for the first time displayed a real willingness and desire constructively to advance their problems and sympathetically to hear those of their neighbor. Some of the problems have been common to all, but many have been individual ones. The economic questions have been at least equal in number and complexity with the military questions.

The records of the ECA tell us that these discussions have turned much light on many fundamental ills that have contributed to unrest and insecurity. Doubtless many thorns have been removed from the path of peace.

The Atlantic Pact, according to its original concept, at least, concerns itself essentially with armed forces and munitions. The ECA is the program that has thus far dealt with the underlying economic questions. I am not proposing that the program be continued beyond its scheduled expiration date next year. I simply want to recognize that aside from the tremendous concrete financial assistance that the program has given the participating nations, it has provided the only effective forum for the democracies of the Atlantic Treaty to discuss and seek to iron out their economic problems and a variety of conflicting interests. I make special reference to the nations of the Atlantic Treaty, the members of the Atlantic community as we commonly know it, because they have more characteristics in common—allied by origin, geography, and vital necessity—and, more importantly, they have proven themselves foremost in the successful establishment of freely chosen elective government.

Expert observers tell us that the Marshall plan countries see the end of the program with considerable misgivings, as if to say, "Will our economic conferences end? Will there be no effective forum wherein we can continue to work at a solution of such questions as trade barriers, promotion of sound trade relations, boundary and monetary differences, and the like?" They know that military strength depends upon economic strength. History records for them the tendency of alliance founded upon military considerations alone to weaken as conditions change.

With such a favorable beginning and the disposition of our Democratic friends to want to work out their age-old differences, it seems to me that every opportunity should be provided for the continuance of such free and wholesome conferences. I see a new challenge to the courageous leadership of the United States that has brought the world thus far along the road to peace. The United States presents to the world the finest example of union of free self-governing people. Perhaps something approaching a union of free nations can be established.

The resolution before the Senate implies no commitment, but simply would have the United States again take the leadership in calling democratic nations together in convention. Not all such nations would be called at the outset. The resolution follows the pattern of the Atlantic Pact resolution and would call, first, the sponsoring nations of the pact. These are the nations that have advanced the furthest in the successful establishment of representative self-government. These nations meeting in convention with the United States and with such other democracies as the convention may invite would explore how far their people can apply among them within the framework of the United Nations the principles of a federal union.

The convention would in nowise conflict with the Atlantic Pact but rather would serve to buttress it. If successful, the union would incorporate and replace the pact.

The calling of the convention will reemphasize the seriousness with which we assume our Atlantic Pact obligations. Passage of the resolution will serve to quiet European fears of our return to isolationism by proving that we are willing to explore the possibility of going beyond the pact and the ECA.

When formed, the Union always will keep the door open to any nation which guarantees individual liberty and popular self-government.

No one knows better than Members of the Senate the rewards of council. Free discussion among the nations of Western Europe has yielded spiritual as well as material rewards. We who believe in the benefits to be derived from free discussion among men of good will see that representative governments have been brought more closely together. New meaning has been given to their separate problems; their relationships are clothed with a new morality. If we look closely, we may see at long last a tendency to union.

I urge the Senate to adopt the Atlantic Union resolution, that, with the concurrence of the House, we may rededicate ourselves to that high purpose and magnificent leadership of which Woodrow Wilson spoke when he said:

> To take part in such a service will be the opportunity for which they (the people of the United States) sought to prepare themselves by the very principles and purposes of their Government, ever since the days when they set up a new Nation in the high and honorable hope that it might in all that it was and did show mankind the way to liberty.

CRITICISM OF EX-PRESIDENT HOOVER BY PAUL HENRI SPAAK

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, today's press carries statements by Paul Henri Spaak, the former Prime Minister of Belgium, who is now on a lecture tour in this country, making an unprecedented attack on former President Hoover.

Some serious questions arise from this shocking incident.

Herbert Hoover is a beloved American citizen whether we agree with his views or not. Pertinent to this issue is the fact that Congress a short time ago did a unique thing in its history by passing a unanimous resolution in tribute to Mr. Hoover for his many services.

It is highly unbecoming for any Belgian in particular to make such a personal attack upon Mr. Hoover. Herbert Hoover spent 5 years of his life in saving the Belgian people from starvation and German tyranny; and for the 30 years that have followed he has conducted various agencies to aid the Belgian people. These agencies have expended large sums on education, scientific research, and on the general welfare of the Belgian people.

The Belgian Government should make an immediate apology to our former President.

Beyond this immediate incident I wish to raise the whole question of an active European official engaging in speaking tours in the United States to influence our foreign policy. What Mr. Spaak says in his own country to his own people is his own affair; but what he says to the American people while in this country is quite another matter.

So far as I am aware, no American official or former official has ever so misused European hospitality. Certainly the American people will not take kindly to this interference by foreigners in momentous decisions which now must be made by the American people themselves. I fear that if Mr. Spaak does not realize the impropriety of his attack on Mr. Hoover and the impropriety of any outside interference in American affairs, his audiences here may pointedly remind him.

FEDERAL THOUGHT CONTROL

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, the Reader's Digest recently published an article condensed from Forbes Magazine on the subject What Taxpayers Pay for Federal Thought Control. This article points up the fact that the executive department has been spending approximately $9,000,000 a month on so-called information service which when analyzed proves to be nothing but propaganda carried on by old-fashioned press agents operating under the more euphonious title mentioned.

Seldom, if ever, do the Washington columnists utter any criticism about these expenditures in the executive department, but the same columnists frequently criticize Members of Congress who use the franking privilege in an effort to furnish the people of the United States with information about the Government and how it operates.

Members of Congress are severely criticized, although they have to pay out of their own pockets for the cost of printing reprints from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These printing costs include paper, ink, and all labor which is connected with the printing. The only thing that comes without cost to the Congressmen is the postage.

In the executive department the salaries of expert press agents and all cost of printing and distribution are paid by the taxpayers.

So far as I am concerned personally, I should be glad to do away with all of these expenditures, both on the part of the executive department and the Congress, but, since it seems impossible to stop the heavy output of press releases by the executive department in which the executive department is lavishly extoled for obviously political purposes, it seems to me that Members of Congress are entitled to get their reports and their views and information about the conduct of Government to their constituents without having to pay postage. All other costs, as I have said before, for this service are borne by the Members of Congress.

The article I have just mentioned in the Reader's Digest is a good example of information that ought to be given out to the taxpayers. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the article which was published in the January 1951 issue of the Reader's Digest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT TAXPAYERS PAY FOR FEDERAL THOUGHT CONTROL

(Condensed from Forbes)

The total campaign expenditures of both Republicans and Democrats during the year 1949 probably did not exceed $12,000,000. But the propaganda efforts of Uncle Sam in the same period amounted to more than $100,000,000. To pay the salaries of Federal publicity men, not to mention others who are camouflaged under various titles in the hundreds of bureaus, the Treasury shells out about $1,500,000 each month; it costs at least $4,000,000 a month to print the releases of these propaganda experts and another $3,500,000 a month for mailing. That is a total of $9,000,000 a month.

The manifestations of Federal propaganda run the gamut of all the tricks used by Hollywood press agents. Some departments maintain congressional liaison officers in the House and Senate Office Buildings. Others stage cocktail parties for Congressmen and private bigwigs who can help sway newspaper, radio, or other audiences. Some actually pay plain Americans to come to staged meetings, at which, in carefully camouflaged programs, a political line is foisted on those who attend.

One such meeting was held last April in St. Paul, Minn., at taxpayer expense estimated at $50,000 by Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN. This meeting of from 5,000 to 6,000 Production and Marketing Administration committeemen, plus community committeemen (those who serve in more or less honorary capacity on various agricultural boards in each county), was promoted by the Department of Agriculture and financed by Federal funds. All were invited with the guaranty of $8 per day plus traveling expenses at 5 cents a mile.

These "bought" listeners heard the Brannan plan extolled by its author, Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan, and by Minnesota's Fair Deal Senator, HUBERT HUMPHREY. Many of those who attended refused to put in claims for payment; they said that it obviously was a political meeting and had no relation to the problems of administering the farm program. But more than 2,000 did put in such claims.

Congressional committees have attempted at times to find out just how extensive are the Government's propaganda activities. Most have given up either through failure to obtain enough money to finance an adequate study or through lack of time to cover the tremendously broad subject.

Some individual Congressmen have been unremitting in their criticism. One such is Representative PAUL W. SHAFER, who in 1938 revealed the foundation of the enormous Federal propaganda structure then a-building. At that time the Department of Agriculture admitted having 45 persons in publicity activities; today it has 600, at salaries ranging up to $12,500 a year.

"Nobody knows the precise extent and organization of this publicity work," the Congressman added. "Why? Because Congress passed a law prohibiting the use of public money to pay salaries to any 'publicity expert' unless specifically appropriated for that purpose. Therefore, those who carry on such functions are hidden behind such titles as 'special assistant,' 'administrative assistant' or 'director of information.' Another legal requirement—that allotments of funds to agencies for printing be not exceeded—is often circumvented by the use of 'duplicating' processes such as multilithing."

Congressmen who criticize Federal propaganda make it clear they are not objecting to legitimate information functions of the Federal Government. Administrators must give their opinions to Congress when requested to do so, but this provision of the law has been subverted to mean that they have the right to send batches of master telegrams to bureaucrats through the country, who in turn persuade citizens to sign the telegrams and send them to Congressmen to pressure the legislators to pass this or that act or appropriation.

What are some of these Federal agencies trying to sell the American public? The principal amounts spent are for the purpose of promoting socialization projects. Department of the Interior concentrates on promoting public power. If there are no big dams in New England, its planners attempt to persuade New Englanders that they need more dams.

Federal experts go into the area and make weighty statements about the necessity for expanding our power resources and taking care of our water resources, and claim that it is the Federal Government's job to build the dams, transmission lines, and so forth. And from then on they take you straight into public ownership.

The Social Security Administration is spending millions of dollars annually on publicity. It and other agencies under Federal Security concentrate on promoting socialized medicine. Men from these agencies fly abroad at public expense to study how socialized medicine was put across in other nations and gather arguments to persuade Congress and the American public to adopt it.

In the Department of Agriculture busy bureaucrats concentrate on selling the Brannan plan. The potentialities of an illegal campaign by this Department are suggested by the agency's size and scope. There are 3,029 county agricultural associations in the country; there are 9,087 county committeemen, and 97,529 community committeemen. More than $200,000,000 is appropriated by Congress for Agriculture personnel each year. Travel and other expenses run close to $5,000,000.

In a 9-month period studied by the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the Department of Agriculture alone ground out 1,998 press clippings, 837 radio scripts, 17 films, and 120,000 copies of its weekly clip sheets.

A survey by a subcommittee of the House Committee on Expenditures, Eightieth Congress, showed that 100 pages of the New York Times would be required to print all the handout material received by that newspaper from Federal agencies during a single week. Much of it was sheer propaganda, designed to influence public thinking and to bring pressure on Congress. This committee found that at least five agencies: United States Public Health Service, Children's Bureau, Office of Education, Department of Agriculture, and Social Security Administration, were using Federal funds illegally to promote socialized medicine.

Extraordinary pressure, said the committee, was exerted on the staffs of the United States Public Health Service to promote compulsory health insurance, and it called attention to a letter sent out on December 10, 1945, to all field men and staff operatives by Thomas Parran, then Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service. This letter referred to President Truman's message to Congress of November 19, 1945, urging enactment of a national health program. It stated: "The appropriate executive agencies of the Government have been specifically instructed by the President to assist in carrying out this legislative program as presented to Congress."

The Surgeon General then continued: "Every officer of the Public Health Service will wish to familiarize himself with the President's message and will be guided by its provisions when making any public statements likely to be interpreted as representing the official views of the Public Health Service."

After its lobby investigation the House committee concluded that "the greatest and most effective lobby in the Nation is that conducted by Federal administrative agencies. The more than 2,000,000 employees on the Federal payroll, strategically assigned throughout the 48 States, comprise a very effective field army."

An investigation revealed that public-information costs of Federal-Government agencies in fiscal 1946 were $74,829,476—nearly three times what they had been 5 years earlier. The present estimate of $100,000,000 is considered conservative. Some 45,000 Federal employees in 1946 devoted their time, wholly or in part, to "information activities." The number is much greater today.

Yet the tangible cost, large as it is, may not be the greatest concern. The danger is that the directors of the bureaucratic publicity machine can use it to impose unsound ideas upon the people.

CAREER OF DR. EUGENE GARDNER

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, early in December a brilliant young nuclear physicist, Dr. Eugene Gardner, died as a result of beryllium poisoning which was contracted while he was working on the atomic bomb. He was without doubt one of this generation's outstanding scientists.

He leaves his wife, Mrs. Dorothy Johnson Gardner, and a 2-year-old daughter, Claire.

He was a native son of Utah, having been born at Logan, where he obtained his education. He was a graduate of the Utah State Agricultural College of the class of 1935.

On December 11, Time magazine published a brief article on the activities of Dr. Gardner. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Eugene Gardner, a brilliant young nuclear physicist, was working in 1942 at Berkeley, Calif., with the Manhattan atomic-bomb project. His secret work required him to drill a hole in an electrode made of beryllium oxide. Out of the hole a fine dust rose and 29-year-old Gardner inhaled it. He did not know, nor did anyone know at the time, that the beryllium in the dust was a slow, implacable poison.

All through the critical years of the bomb project, Gardner worked at Oak Ridge and Los Alamos. As one colleague put it, his brain was "one of the Nation's great natural resources." When he returned to Berkeley in 1945, his disease was well advanced. He complained of fatigue and shortness of breath. X-ray examination of his chest showed fibrosis in both lungs. But no one could tell the cause; no treatment did any good. He had hardly enough strength for laboratory desk work.

But his scientist's brain was as good as ever. In 1948 he became nationally known as codiscoverer (with Dr. Giulio Lattes) of the man-made meson, a basic atomic particle produced by the 184-inch cyclotron at the University of California (Time, March 15, 1948). About the same time his disease was finally diagnosed correctly as berylliosis (beryllium poisoning).

Fame does not cure berylliosis. Tuberculosis attacked Dr. Gardner's poisoned lungs. He spent most of his time in Vallejo Community Hospital, often under an oxygen tent. Even when feeling his best, he was forbidden by the doctors to lift his newborn daughter Claire, now 2 years old. But he kept a microscope near his bed and worked on his meson research whenever he had strength enough. During final hours under the oxygen tent, knowing that death would no longer be denied, he worked with pencil and notebook, painfully gleaning his brain while he still had time for last bits of knowledge to pass along to the living. Last week at Vallejo, his work all but done, Dr. Gardner laid down his notebook and died.

RECESS

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 16 (legislative day of January 8), 1951:

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ADMINISTRATOR

Millard F. Caldwell, Jr., of Florida, to be Federal Civil Defense Administrator.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, clouds and darkness are around Thee, yet righteousness and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne which is established forever upon the moral pillars of the world. In times heavy with crisis Thou hast called us to play our part in one of the creative hours in human history.

In the midst of the startling changes of our day, may we be delivered from the paralysis of pessimism and cynicism. We thank Thee that in the name of a free people ours is now the high privilege of signing anew, with our own sacrifice, the immortal declaration, crimsoned with the devotion of the founding fathers: "We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

In this age on ages telling, may we fail not man nor Thee. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 16, 1951, was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. O'CONOR:

S. 516. A bill to amend the act incorporating the American Legion so as to redefine (a) the powers of said corporation, (b) the right to the use of the name "The American Legion" and "American Legion"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. LEHMAN introduced Senate bill 517, to preserve the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River and to authorize the construction of certain public works on that river for power and other purposes, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LEHMAN:

S. 518. A bill for the relief of Dr. Isac C. Goldstein;

S. 519. A bill for the relief of Moy Chin Shee;

S. 520. A bill for the relief of Wilma M. Stiehl;

S. 521. A bill for the relief of Jacob Issahar Zadeh, and Bluma Issahar Zadeh;

S. 522. A bill for the relief of Spyrodon Vlassopoulos and his wife, Theresa; and

S. 523. A bill for the relief of Walter Duschinsky; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FERGUSON:

S. 524. A bill or the relief of Clorinda Ceretani; and

S. 525. A bill for the relief of Jacob Gitlin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FERGUSON (for himself and Mr. VANDENBERG):

S. 526. A bill for the relief of Dr. Lorna Wan-Hsi Feng; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KNOWLAND:

S. 527. A bill for the relief of Youichi Nobori; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KNOWLAND (for himself and Mr. NIXON):

S. 528. A bill to confer jurisdiction on the United States District Court for the Northern District of California to hear, determine, and render judgment upon certain claims of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McMAHON:

S. 529. A bill for the relief of Humayag Dildilian and his daughter, Lucy Dildilian; and

S. 530. A bill for the relief of Gerhard H. A. Anton Bebr; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NEELY (by request):

S. 531. A bill to amend section 1537 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended, so as to provide for service of process on agents of a nonresident individual, partnership, association, group, organization, or foreign corporation, conducting a business in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

S. 532. A bill to authorize the cancellation or settlement of claims of the District of Columbia against the estates of recipients of old-age assistance; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

(Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself, Mr. O'CONOR, Mr. LONG, Mr. GILLETTE, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. HUNT, Mr. BENTON, Mr. TOBEY, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. THYE, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL) introduced Senate bill 533, to create the Small Defense Plants Corporation and to preserve small-business institutions and free, competitive enterprise, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. FERGUSON:

S. 534. A bill to provide for 26 days' annual leave and 15 days' sick leave for employees in the field service of the Post Office Department; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(Mr. McCARRAN introduced Senate bill 535, to provide for the separation of mail pay from subsidies in the case of air carriers engaged in international air transportation, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. EASTLAND (for himself and Mr. STENNIS):

S. 536. A bill for the relief of the estate of Sidney Lomax, deceased; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado (by request) introduced Senate bill 537, to provide for the greater security and defense of the United States against attack, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. CORDON:

S. 538. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service, and for other purposes," approved April 24, 1950 (64 Stat. 82); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

S. 539. A bill relating to the administrative jurisdiction of certain public lands in the State of Oregon; and

S. 540. A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the city of Klamath Falls, Oreg., all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in certain lands in Klamath County, Oreg., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 541. A bill for the relief of Tulana Farms; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 542. A bill to authorize the construction of a dam and dike to prevent the flow of tidal waters into Oar Creek, Douglas County, Oreg.; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. BREWSTER (for himself and Mrs. SMITH of Maine):

S. J. Res. 18. Joint resolution authorizing the International Joint Commission to make a survey to determine the most economical and most feasible plan for the construction of the proposed Passamaquoddy tidal power project at Passamaquoddy Bay in the State of Maine and the Province of New Brunswick and authorizing the appropriation of not to exceed $3,900,000 to defray the cost thereof, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. CORDON:

S. J. Res. 19. Joint resolution to designate the lake to be formed by the McNary lock and dam in the Columbia River, Oreg., and Wash., as Lake Umatilla; to the Committee on Public Works.

NIAGARA REDEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill entitled "Niagara Redevelopment Act of 1951" and I ask unanimous consent that a statement on the bill, prepared jointly by myself and Representative FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, Jr., of New York, who is introducing the same bill in the House, be printed in the body of the RECORD, together with a brief memorandum pointing out the differences between the Niagara Redevelopment Act of 1950 and the proposed bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement and memorandum will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from New York. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 517) to preserve the scenic beauty of the Niagara Falls and River and to authorize the construction of certain public works on that river for power and other purposes, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. LEHMAN, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The statement and memorandum presented by Mr. LEHMAN are as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LEHMAN

We are today introducing a bill for the redevelopment of the waters of the Niagara River for public power purposes.

This bill differs only in some technical aspects from the measure we drafted and introduced last year and on which hearings were held before the House Public Works Committee. The differences between last year's bill and the present one are described in an attached memorandum.

The present budget contains an item of $2,000,000 for a preliminary survey and for the preparation of engineering designs for this project. It is to be assumed that funds will be requested from the Congress in the appropriations bill for this purpose.

Before these funds are voted, it would be highly desirable to have formal authorization for this project on the statute books.

The needs of the national defense program and of the mobilization of our full industrial potential for the critical period ahead call for vastly expanded power. The availability of 8,000,000,000 kilowatts of power annually from the Niagara redevelopment—power which can be developed at low cost and marketed at low cost—is a mandate in itself for speedy congressional action on our bill. The Senate, in its reservation to the Niagara Treaty, specified that this power was to be developed for public use and benefit in such a manner as Congress might direct. I believe that our bill fulfills all the requisites for protecting all the interests of New York State, of the Federal Government, and of national defense. It provides against all exigencies, placing the chief emphasis on the earliest possible completion of the project and the most prompt availability of the power from this project to meet the public and national need.

If the project work is rushed by the Corps of Engineers, the first power can be coming off generators by the end of 1952, if not before. This will be at a time when national mobilization will be at its peak and when the power from the Niagara will be desperately needed.

This power will save the consumers of New York and of the surrounding area $65,000,000 annually. There will be a saving to the taxpayers, too, because the low cost of this power will be immediately reflected in the decreased cost of the defense items that must be purchased by the Government. In the case of such products as aluminum, the cost of power is the chief component of the total cost of production.

The record of last year's hearings before the House Public Works Committee furnishes a good start. We shall urge the chairman of the appropriate House and Senate committees to begin hearings on this bill at the earliest possible date.

COMPARISON BETWEEN NIAGARA REDEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1951 AND S. 3526 (H. R. 8343)

1. Language changes have been made in recognition of the fact that the Niagara Treaty has already been ratified and is now the law of the land.

2. Provision is made for submission of the plans for the remedial works (to preserve the beauty of Niagara Falls) to the International Joint Commission and for the carrying out of the remedial works under the supervision of the International Joint Commission.

3. The primary rights and interests of national defense are spelled out in terms of section 16 of the Federal Power Act, and the Department of Defense is included among the entities to be given preference in the distribution of the power from the Niagara project.

4. There has been a comprehensive change in the legislative format of section 3 for purposes of simplification. This did not involve a change in substance.

SMALL DEFENSE PLANTS CORPORATION

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to create the Small Defense Plants Corporation, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the bill by myself and Representative PATMAN be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Alabama. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 533) to create the Small Defense Plants Corporation and to preserve small-business institutions and free, competitive enterprise, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and other Senators) was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statement presented by Mr. SPARKMAN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SPARKMAN AND REPRESENTATIVE PATMAN

In this period of national emergency, it has become imperative for Congress to create an agency with the power to make small business a full partner in the mobilization effort and to solve the special problems which small enterprises will face in the months ahead.

It is for this purpose that we, as chairmen of the Senate and House Small Business Committees, today have introduced legislation known as the Small Defense Plants Act of 1951. We have the unanimous backing of our committees in presenting this legislation; all the members of the Senate Small Business Committee are acting as cosponsors of the bill—Senators HERBERT R. O'CONOR, RUSSELL B. LONG, GUY M. GILLETTE, LESTER C. HUNT, WILLIAM BENTON, CHARLES W. TOBEY, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, EDWARD J. THYE, ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON, ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL. The bill has also been endorsed unanimously by the House Small Fusiness Committee members—Eugene J. Keogh, Mike Mansfield, Joe L. Evins, Clarence G. Burton, Charles A. Halleck, William S. Hill, R. Walter Riehlman, Franklin H. Lichtenwalter.

This legislation is similar to the Small Defense Plants Act of 1950, introduced on July 26, 1950. We cannot emphasize too strongly that its passage during this session of Congress is more urgently needed than ever before.

The necessity for the passage of such legislation arises from the critical conditions now faced by the Nation. There is no question but that small businesses could make a major contribution to the mobilization effort. Located in towns and cities of every State, our smaller industrial facilities represent great productive capacity, are flexible and capable of manufacturing hundreds of types of articles urgently needed for the defense effort.

In addition, small business is the prime source of our strength, the system of competitive free enterprise which has made us the preeminent industrial Nation of the world. It is the fount of initiative, growth, and development in the economic life of the Nation. Big business grows from small business.

Failure to give small business its adequate place during the present mobilization is fully as serious as failure to protect the Nation from foreign aggressors. Injury to small business is the equivalent of letting our system of free, competitive enterprise be riddled beyond repair.

SPECIAL SMALL-BUSINESS LEGISLATION URGENTLY NEEDED IN THE PRESENT DEFENSE PROGRAM

Small firms were facing handicaps even before the present mobilization period. Since the Korean outbreak, small-business problems have intensified, and they will increase manyfold as we enter full mobilization, unless Congress and the executive agencies are alert to preserve small business as a vital portion of our economy.

During the months ahead, the small-business man inevitably will face curtailment of civilian production. Materials will be scarce and more costly. Additional controls and restrictions on production will be imposed. The small-business man cannot face these curtailments as easily as can big business, with its backlog of materials and financial reserves.

Unless immediate action is taken, large producers almost certainly will allocate the bulk of materials to affiliate or subsidiary fabricators, and the small, independent companies will be forced to take what, if anything, is left. The small-business man will find it almost impossible to compete with large manufacturers for defense contracts unless specific action is taken to aid him.

Small enterprises have learned through bitter experience that legislative action on their behalf is essential in periods of mobilization.

During the early years of World War II, the larger corporations were successful in mobilizing the resources of their own companies, but they made no real attempt to tap the productive reservoir of small enterprises.

Although small business could have made invaluable contributions to the war effort during the period from 1940 through 1942, for these 2 years the small-business man was forgotten and ignored. His plants lay idle. His markets vanished. His supply of materials dried up. His industrial skills were unused. His labor drifted away to other plants. During these 2 years, 16 percent of the small businesses in the United States closed their doors.

CREATION OF SMALLER WAR PLANTS CORPORATION IN 1942 WAS RECOGNITION OF SMALL-BUSINESS CRISIS

Congress finally recognized this critical situation in 1942, and remedied it by creation of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. But SWPC did not really begin to function effectively until 1944, when the peak of war production had passed. Nevertheless, Smaller War Plants assisted small firms in obtaining nearly a billion dollars in subcontracts and more than $5,500,000,000 in prime contracts. It loaned more than $550,000,000 to small business, with insignificant losses. It stimulated a recognition of the importance of small business in the national economy.

Creation of the Smaller War Plants Corporation came almost too late to save small business during World War II. The Eighty-second Congress now has the opportunity to act in time to prevent a repetition of the conditions which proved so disastrous to small business from 1940 through 1942.

The Defense Production Act (Public Law 774, 81st Cong., September 8, 1950) included small-business provisions which did not contain standards to utilize effectively the facilities of small-business enterprise in the mobilization program. No assurance was offered that small business would participate in supplying essential civilian requirements. In essence, the Defense Production Act provided no more than a declaration of policy insofar as small business was concerned.

Experience with the administration of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, which was set up as a part of the War Production Board, has convinced us of the need for a separate and distinct agency to mobilize all small business. We also are convinced that certain permissive clauses in the Smaller War Plants Act were ineffective.

These defects are rectified in the Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1951, which we have introduced today. This legislation will establish a separate agency for small business, with the permissive clauses replaced by mandatory provisions assuring that positive action will be taken in behalf of the Nation's small enterprises.

In broad terms, the Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1951 provides that small business be assisted—

1. To secure a fair share of Government contracts under the national defense program;

2. To secure a fair share of scarce materials for essential civilian production;

3. To be assured fair and equitable treatment when acting as subcontractors;

4. To obtain loans for expansion and conversion in the interests of the national defense program; and

5. To achieve full economic and industrial mobilization.

SMALL-BUSINESS DEFENSE PLANTS ACT WILL PROVIDE A POSITIVE PROGRAM FOR SMALL BUSINESS

To accomplish these objectives, the bill provides a revolving fund of a maximum of $500,000,000 to allow the Small Defense Plants Corporation to make loans and acquire property. It allows the Small Defense Plants Corporation to enter into contracts with the United States Government and to let subcontracts to small-business concerns.

Other Government agencies would be required to consult with the Corporation in determining the means by which small business can be brought most fully and effectively into the effort to produce goods for defense and for essential civilian use. The Corporation also would be empowered to make or have made a complete inventory of productive facilities of small-business concerns which can be used for such production.

The Corporation would be authorized to take appropriate action to insure that small-business subcontractors receive fair and equitable prices, conditions, and terms from prime contractors.

The bill also would provide assurance that small enterprises receive a fair share of scarce materials, equipment, and supplies which may be allocated by the Government. In addition, there are provisions assuring that small businesses shall receive a fair proportion of Government contracts.

Response of small-business men throughout the Nation to the Small Business Defense Plants Act has been enthusiastic.

Since the act first was introduced last July, the Senate and House Small Business Committees have received many communications from small-business men urging that the bill be given prompt consideration and passage.

UTILIZATION OF SMALL BUSINESS IS ESSENTIAL TO FULL MOBILIZATION PROGRAM

When the Defense Production Act first was made law there was some ground for hope that partial mobilization of our resources would be sufficient for an indefinite period.

Unfortunately for the peace and happiness of the people of the world, this has not proved to be the case. In the late fall the human pawns in the vast movement for communistic domination advanced from the inner recesses of Red China. This horde came in such numbers that the modest forces of the United Nations on the Korean Peninsula found it necessary to retire.

It was apparent instantly that partial mobilization would not suffice. It was necessary for the President of the United States on December 16 to declare a national emergency. This meant the full mobilization of the military and economic resources of the Nation.

It also means that, if we are to mobilize completely, every single unit in our industrial family must be put to work, as every man and woman is expected to share in the responsibility for a total defense. Small-business concerns cannot be neglected or unused.

Strangely enough, it is well-nigh impossible to obtain more than recognition of this necessity under present defense laws. Recognition and savory phrases will not do the job. We must have new legislation if all of the component parts of business and industry are to bear their full share of the responsibility for strengthening our Military Establishment and providing for the necessities of life for the civilian population.

SEPARATION OF MAIL PAY FROM SUBSIDIES IN CASE OF CERTAIN AIR CARRIERS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the separation of mail pay from subsidies in the case of air carriers engaged in international air transportation.

For some time past, considerable attention has been given to the question of separating airline subsidies from air-mail pay.

An investigation with respect to the domestic aspect of this problem has been made by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and the report is current that a new bill on this subject, concerned with only domestic air transportation, has been agreed upon by airline representatives and others.

The further report is that the airlines are asking for another year of study, by the Civil Aeronautics Administration, concerning the problem involved in separation of subsidies from mail pay in the field of international air transportation.

I have been much interested in this question of the separation of subsidies from mail pay, as I am interested in all questions having to do with the growth and development of air transportation; and I have worked out a method of separation of mail pay from subsidies in the field of international air transportation which I believe is sound and fair and will, after study, have rather wide acceptance.

I do not wish at this time to claim for my bill any virtues which it may not have, or to enter into prolonged argument with respect to it. Therefore, I do not propose to summarize its provisions nor generalize with regard to them. I simply offer the bill for introduction, and I urge members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and others who are interested in this subject, to give it their careful study. I hope the bill may also have most serious and critical consideration by the air carriers whom it would affect, and by all others who are interested in this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill introduced by the Senator from Nevada will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 535) to provide for the separation of mail pay from subsidies in the case of air carriers engaged in international air transportation, introduced by Mr. McCARRAN, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SECURITY AND DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST ATTACK

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the greater security and defense of the United States against attack, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, from the office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense, signed by Marx Leva, dated January 16, 1951, explaining the purpose of the proposed legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Colorado. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 537) to provide for the greater security and defense of the United States against attack, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado is as follows:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1951.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There is forwarded herewith a draft of proposed legislation, "To provide for the greater security and defense of the United States against attack, and for other purposes." This proposal is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1951, and has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget. The Department of Defense recommends that it be enacted by the Congress at an early date.

Purpose of the legislation: The purpose of the proposed legislation is to provide the necessary Executive authority to control electromagnetic radiation, not only during hostilities or a proclaimed emergency, but also during time of strained international relationships when a surprise attack on the United States is a possibility.

Current concepts of warfare and recent experience demonstrate the necessity to control electromagnetic radiation in the United States, its Territories, and possessions, during periods of critical international relationships, for the purpose of denying their use to a potential enemy for navigation of piloted or pilotless aircraft or missiles directed toward targets in the United States. The authority of this proposed legislation must be provided now in order that further planning and preparations may be completed so that air defense plans may be implemented without delay in the event of an air attack. It is requested that further justification for the urgent necessity of this legislation be given to you in secret session.

Legislative references: Some executive authority is provided by section 606 (c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended. However, it is believed that that authority is inadequate for the purpose stated above.

Cost and budget data: Section 3 provides for just compensation to the owner for use by a department or agency of the United States of any instrument, device, apparatus, or thing. It is impossible to estimate the extent of such compensation and the resulting cost to the Government.

Department of Defense action agency: The Department of the Air Force has been designated as the representative of the Department of Defense for this legislation.

In accordance with a long-established custom, the Department of Defense submitted to the Senate Committee on Armed Services a proposal identical with this proposal for consideration by the Eighty-first Congress. We have been informed that that earlier proposal was referred by the Committee on Armed Services to your committee. In view of the referral of that earlier proposal to your committee and in view of the urgency of this proposal, we are forwarding this proposal directly to your committee for consideration.

Sincerely yours,

MARX LEVA.

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY FOR STUDY AND SURVEY OF HEALTH INSURANCE PLANS BY COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 39), which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 273, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to May 26, 1950 (providing for study and survey of health insurance plans in the United States, the activities of State and local governments in the field of health services, and related matters), is hereby continued until March 31, 1951.

PRINTING ADDITIONAL COPIES OF PAMPHLET ENTITLED "SELLING TO YOUR GOVERNMENT"

Mr. SPARKMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 40), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That there be printed 30,000 additional copies of the pamphlet entitled "Selling to Your Government," such additional copies to be for the use of the Select Committee on Small Business.

A PLAN FOR PEACE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBERTSON

[Mr. O'CONOR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement regarding universal military service, issued by the Committee on the Present Danger, which appears in the Appendix.]

TACTICS—NOT A STRATEGY—OF FREEDOM—ARTICLE BY PROF. LEV E. DOBRIANSKY

[Mr. SMITH of New Jersey asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Tactics—Not a Strategy—of Freedom," written by Prof. Lev E. Dobriansky, and published in the January 1, 1951, issue of the Ukrainian Bulletin, which appears in the Appendix.]

REGULATIONS ON INDIAN COUNSEL—LETTER FROM ALDEN STEVENS

[Mr. CHAVEZ asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter on the subject of regulations on Indian counsel, written by Alden Stevens, secretary, Association of American Indian Affairs, Inc., of New York, and printed in a recent publication, which appears in the Appendix.]

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE—ARTICLE BY JAMES RESTON

[Mr. LEHMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Congress Veto on Troops Could Cripple United States Policy," written by James Reston, and published in the New York Times of January 15, 1951, which appears in the Appendix.]

WHERE SHALL WE LOOK FOR LEADERSHIP?—EDITORIAL BY DAVID LAWRENCE

[Mr. McCARRAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Where Shall We Look for Leadership?" written by David Lawrence, and published in the United States News and World Report December 29, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE ROAD TO BIPARTISANSHIP—ARTICLE BY HOLMES ALEXANDER

[Mr. WATKINS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "The Road to Bipartisanship," written by Holmes Alexander, and published in his column entitled "Washington Affairs" in the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram of December 20, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

MONTHLY BENEFITS ASSUMING BASIC PENSION RATE OF $50 PER MONTH

[Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a tabulation prepared by him showing the monthly benefits which would be paid to those aged 65 or over under the proposal for a universal-eligibility social security, which appears in the Appendix.]

SHIPMENT OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS TO COMMUNIST-DOMINATED AREAS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'CONOR

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, recently there has been discussion regarding the shipping of strategic materials to Communist-dominated areas, and the Secretary of Commerce has given his version in regard to the matter. I have prepared a detailed statement based upon the findings and investigations of the Subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'CONOR

I would have preferred not to make this statement, particularly when it had been our intention to concentrate our future efforts upon a different phase of foreign trade, namely, continued shipping of strategic materials by Western European nations to Communist-dominated areas.

In fact, I had hoped that the discussion had ended about shipments from the United States to our Communist foes in China. But in the past few days the Secretary of Commerce has seen fit to reopen the controversy. In a Boston speech he invited further debate about the matter.

The Secretary charged falsification and misrepresentation to those of us who had felt obliged to reveal facts about shipments to Red China of critical materials. He further alleged unfairness in the accusations and indicated, in a thinly disguised reference, that the Senate subcommittee's statements were concocted or misinterpreted in order to create a sensation.

Under the circumstances, and in order that the record be clear and unmistakable, I think a discussion of the points raised by the Secretary is required.

COPPER SHIPMENTS

After denying that exports of copper from the United States occurred during 1950, the Secretary admitted that one transshipment of copper took place in February 1950 from Japan through this country and around the world to the Communists in China. He declares, however, that no copper has been shipped since that date.

The facts concerning the copper transshipped through the United States to Red China are as follows: (1) 658,142 pounds; left New York on the steamship Flying Cloud on January 5, 1950; (2) 440,923 pounds; left New York on the steamship Flying Arrow on March 14, 1950; (3) 731,523 pounds; left New York on the Steamship Flying Arrow on March 14, 1950; (4) 618,163 pounds; left New York on the steamship Flying Arrow on April 3, 1950; (6) 354,954 pounds; left New York on the steamship Brooklyn Heights on April 3, 1950; (6) 354,954 pounds, left New York on the steamship Brooklyn Heights on April 3, 1950; (7) 1,120,000 pounds; left New York on the steamship Empire Glencoe after April 3, 1950.

SILICON STEEL SHEETS

But confining attention to the Secretary's assertion that there have been no shipments of anything, strategic or otherwise, to Communist China since they entered the war in Korea, let me remind him that as late as November 16, 1950, a shipment of 24,672 pounds of silicon steel sheets was allowed to leave New York on the steamship Igadi destined for Taku Bar, Red China.

The Secretary stresses the fact that last February his Department learned of the subterfuge of transshipping from a foreign port to New York and thence to Communist China. Well, the fact is that other transshipments occurred after his Department was on notice of this evasion of our export control regulations. Here are the facts regarding these transshipments of steel sheets through the United States to Red China: 368,642 pounds left New York on or about July 19, 1950, on the steamship Cape Race destined for Taku Bar, North China; 53,635 pounds left New York on or about August 4, 1950, on the steamship Flying Arrow destined for Taku Bar, North China; 42,282 pounds left New York on or about July 31, 1950, on the steamship Berghold destined for Taku Bar, North China.

In addition, one company imported two further shipments, amounting to 55,115 pounds and 44,890 pounds, respectively, which arrived in the port of New York on November 3, 1950. However, by this time the president of the company had been served with a subpena to appear before the Senate subcommittee. He thereupon changed his plans for shipping these silicon steel sheets to China and disposed of them on the United States market. Ascertaining that the steamship Igadi was to touch at a Pacific port, we telegraphed the Secretary of Commerce requesting that these steel sheets and other shipments of strategic importance be removed from ships before they left United States shores, which was done.

We further called attention to the loophole in the OIT regulations which permitted transshipments of strategic materials through United States ports and by means of United States vessels, and it was not until after this complaint was made that the Department of Commerce, on December 3, 1950, established new regulations prohibiting transshipments of any goods of foreign origin through the ports of the United States or by use of American vessels.

This belated action was taken 5 months after hostilities began in Korea and after China had entered the war against us.

This was followed by additional regulations issued on December 6, revoking all licenses on shipments to Red China, Manchuria, Hong Kong, and Macao. It was not until December 8, 1950, that the Department of Commerce finally issued an order which barred the transportation or discharge by American ships and aircraft of strategic and critical materials destined for countries in the Soviet bloc, China, Hong Kong, and Macao.

PETROLATUM

The Secretary in his address claims that he stopped shipments of lubricating oil to China in 1949, and he observed that "about 2 months ago we noticed an increase in mineral-oil shipments which we had assumed would be used internally by human beings. When it appeared that this mineral oil might be used as a substitute—though a very poor substitute—for lubricating oil, we shut that off, too. He added that he personally ordered 1,250 drums taken off the docks in New York when they were about to be loaded.

Here it is pertinent to note that, at the very time a portion of the petrolatum shipment was being removed, the Federal officials gave formal consent for the remaining portion to go to China, and that shipment was delivered to our Communist foes. If it was dangerous to have allowed one portion of the load to go, why was permission given to transport the remaining drums on the very same vessel, the steamship Flying Cloud? This authorization was given by the Office of International Trade after we had protested and submitted data in support of our demands.

The facts are that the subcommittee called these unusually large shipments of petrolatum to the attention of the Secretary of Commerce after our staff had examined export declarations and ship manifests of boats leaving United States ports. Attention had been drawn to the fact that more than 50,000 gallons were being loaded for China on one vessel alone. When the chairman called these facts to the attention of the Department of Commerce, the Department issued a notice on November 1, 1950, effective at 10 a. m. putting petrolatum and petrolatum jelly on the positive list and prohibiting their export without a license.

It is clear that it was the Senate subcommittee which took the initiative in this matter, and it is further clear that if the Senate subcommittee had not issued its protest, all of this petrolatum would have been shipped to our enemies. It is pertinent to point out that the Department of Commerce had been very slow to perceive the enormous increase in the shipments of petrolatum, because 2,254,311 pounds of this product had been shipped since the onset of the Korean war from the port of New York alone between the months of June and October, 1950.

TIN PLATE

With reference to tin plate the Secretary of Commerce points to the fact that tin plate rejects had not been placed on the positive list, requiring license, stating that these rejects are of such low grade that the interagency committee responsible for deciding which exports are strategic saw no reason to give them such a classification. Incidentally, this interagency committee includes representatives of the defense agencies.

A review of the shipping documents filed between August and October 1950, at the port of New York alone, revealed that more than 19,381,014 pounds of tin mill waste waste had been shipped from the port of New York in this 3-month period, together with more than 4,000,000 pounds of other steel products, 2,500,000 pounds of galvanized pipe, 167,774 pounds of boiler tube, 419,171 pounds of aluminum, 669,000 pounds of silicon steel, 2,250,000 pounds of petrolatum, and 709,000 pounds of lubricating oil and grease, among other products.

Testimony given to us in executive session by experts was to the effect that the waste waste tin plate could readily be used for strategic purposes, such as making ammunition containers, and so forth. The subcommitee likewise was reliably informed by officials in the National Defense Agency that after they learned of the extremely large shipments they had taken the position that tin plate waste waste should be placed on the positive list.

Again, however, it was only after hearings were held and the enormous shipments were publicly revealed that the Secretary of Commerce announced, on December 3, 1950, that all shipments from the United States to mainland China, Hong Kong, and Macao were subject to license.

PENICILLIN

In the matter of important "miracle drugs" the Secretary has this to say in his statement regarding the shipment from this country to the Communists of antibiotics: "About the time the Chinese Communists came into the war in Korea it appeared that these drugs were being purchased in abnormal quantities for shipment to China. These shipments were thereupon stopped. We even stopped shipments on the high seas."

The facts are that in 1949 China imported 37,012,300,000 oxford units of penicillin. For the 9-month period from January to September 1950, the importations of penicillin practically tripled, to the figure of 98,092,800,000 oxford units. It is even more important to note that the imports to Hong Kong in the year 1949 from the United States totaled 3,139,607,100,060 penicillin oxford units; that in the 9-month period from January to September 1950, the amount of penicillin imported was more than doubled, and there were shipped to Hong Kong from the United States 6,735,390,400,000 oxford units.

It must be pointed out that there is no doubt in the minds of any of the experts that almost all imports to Hong Kong are virtually absorbed by China. It can safely be assumed that this enormous amount of penicillin was shipped inland to China. The fact is that it was not until mid-November 1950, after Communist China had openly entered the Korean war, that Commerce placed penicillin on the positive list.

Again the question must be raised as to why the Department of Commerce had to wait until this committee initiated its investigation and started to examine the figures on the shipments of penicillin before taking action to stop the export of this commodity. There can be no doubt that the excessive amount of penicillin exported to China was to be devoted to Communist warfare in Korea. We have been advised that military intelligence became alarmed at this large quantity going to Hong Kong and China. Here again it seems evident that our Office of International Trade was slow to take action to prevent these shipments from reaching China.

COTTON

In a statement on the Senate floor on December 21, 1950, it was pointed out that since the outbreak of the Korean war on June 25, 1950, six shipments involving almost 50,000,000 pounds of cotton are known to have been exported to Manchuria and Red China direct. These shipments from this country have been made with the full knowledge and consent of Federal officials. They were shipped from New Orleans as follows: On July 13, 1950, 13,000 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; on July 13, 1950, 1,857 bales to Darien, Manchuria: on July 17, 1950, 7,520 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; on August 7, 1950, 10,127 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; on August 7, 1950, 3,946 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; on August 21, 1950, 3,615 bales to Taku Bar, China; on August 24, 1950, 800 bales to Taku Bar, China; on August 24, 1950, 2,839 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; on August 28, 1950, 4,859 bales to Dairen, Manchuria; total, 48,563 bales.

It is extremely difficult to understand why this vast amount of highly strategic material was permitted to go to Red China and Manchuria after the outbreak of the Korean war, particularly in view of the fact that cotton is one of the items in short supply in the United States and was put under export control on September 8, 1950.

The astounding fact is that as late as a few weeks ago shipments of highly useful materials were on the high seas being transported on United States flag ships to Communist China. The Office of International Trade had not prevented these shipments leaving our ports, as should have been done.

It is true that the Department clamped down the lid in December after recognizing the fact that these materials were susceptible of military or industrial use by the Reds. But if there was necessity for stopping them in December, why were they allowed to be shipped to the Communists over a period of months even after the war had been launched by our enemies?

It is unfortunate that the Secretary of Commerce by not too veiled an implication felt called upon to accuse the subcommittee of unfairness in its investigation and in its conclusions and statements. The documented facts quoted above speak for themselves. The successive dates on which items were added to the positive list, and other steps taken to prevent just the type of shipments which the subcommittee criticized, certainly bear out the assertion that the Office of International Trade did not act with reasonable promptness in discharging its responsibility. In fact, it had to be prodded continuingly by the subcommittee before remedial action was taken.

It must be remembered that the Congress is charged with the duty of seeing that the laws of the country are being properly administered. It is regrettable that at times it is necessary to bring the force of public opinion to bear before indicated action is taken by some of the executive departments. The facts developed by the subcommittee with regard to the shipments in question were intended to have—and, it is believed, did have—a constructive effect and did bring about—belatedly, let it be again emphasized—action to prevent shipment to our enemies of materials which they needed badly and some of which we could ill afford to spare.

I repeat, thousands of pounds of strategic materials and thousands of gallons of petroleum and other products were shipped from this country, destined for our enemies, and these practices were not stopped, in most cases, until we had developed shocking facts and had made urgent demands upon the Office of International Trade for action.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE—MODIFICATION OF UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into regarding the hour at which the Senate will proceed to vote on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, Senate Resolution 8, be modified to the extent of changing the hour from 3 o'clock p. m. to 2 o'clock p. m., on Tuesday, January 23, 1951.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is changed accordingly.

TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 5 minutes on the subject of Benjamin Franklin, the two hundred forty-fifth anniversary of whose birth falls on today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Pennsylvania may proceed.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, today is the two hundred forty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, America's greatest master of statecraft and diplomacy, foremost champion of freedom and self-government and mighty genius of our Nation's beginnings.

We honor his memory as a patriot of American independence, as the first citizen of Pennsylvania, and as a great benefactor of mankind.

Many volumes have been written in praise of his illustrious career. His brilliant achievements as an author, philosopher, scientist, statesman, and diplomat mark him as one of the giant intellects of all time.

It is impossible to measure his vast contribution to the glory of our Republic and to the progress of humanity.

Franklin was a man of peace but he recognized the necessity of a strong defense. He was one of the earliest advocates of disciplined military training for the protection of the frontier settlements against the Indians. He organized a militia company in 1746, and through his efforts the General Assembly of Pennsylvania adopted a bill creating a volunteer militia on a permanent basis in 1755.

In the Albany Congress of 1754, called to unite the colonies against the French and Indians, he presented a Plan of Union which has been acclaimed as the forerunner of the Federal Union.

Three years later he was in England, launched upon a career in diplomacy which was to be crowned by his brilliant success in winning an alliance with France that hastened American victory in the struggle for independence.

He was the only man of the founding fathers who had the distinction of signing all four documents of our freedom: the Declaration of Independence, the treaty of alliance with France, the treaty of peace with England, and the Constitution of the United States.

In 1783 he wrote:

> At length we are in peace. God be praised, and long, very long may it continue! All wars are follies, very expensive and very mischievous ones. When will mankind be convinced of this, and agree to settle their differences by arbitration? Were they to do this, even by the cast of a die, it would be better than by destroying each other.

Another impressive quotation from Franklin, written a year later, appears on the cover of the current issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

> Let us beware—

Franklin wrote—

> of being lulled into dangerous security; and of being * * * weakened by internal contentions and divisions; * * * and of neglect in military exercises and discipline, and in providing stores of arms and munitions of war; for * * * the expenses required to prevent a war are much lighter than those that will, if not prevented, be necessary to maintain it.

Commenting on that sound advice from Benjamin Franklin, the editor of the Saturday Evening Post points out that it "is sort of hard to tell whether he is talking to the Continental Congress or the United States Eighty-second Congress."

Twenty-seven years ago in an address at a dinner of the International Benjamin Franklin Society of New York, the Honorable James M. Beck, a distinguished Pennsylvanian who was then Solicitor General of the United States, paid tribute to the memory of Dr. Franklin. Mr. Beck's remarks were eloquent and scholarly, and I should like to read a brief excerpt from them because the thoughts expressed are applicable to the problems we face today.

Referring to Benjamin Franklin, Mr. Beck said:

> Some of the acute problems of the present day could be readily solved if this generation had his spirit of toleration, his love of constructive achievement, and his genius of common sense.
> How wise would be his counsels in this hysterical generation when the whole world seems topsy-turvy; when many classes are in revolt against the institutions which make for stability; when the counsels of men are darkened with vain misgivings and legislators and administrators too often flee in abject cowardice before the rising dust of an advancing windstorm.
> To all the causes of our present discontent he would apply, if again in our midst, his well-poised judgment and unfailing humor. He would urge that many of our problems could be solved by more working and less talking.

Mr. President, every American can find patriotic inspiration in the words and deeds of Benjamin Franklin. His career should be studied for guidance in these days of perplexity and confusion in world affairs.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, at this point in my remarks, a compilation of the principal events in the life of Benjamin Franklin, taken from the Harvard Classics.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN—THE PRINCIPAL EVENTS IN HIS LIFE

Ending, as it does, with the year 1757, the autobiography leaves important facts unrecorded. It has seemed advisable, therefore, to detail the chief events in Franklin's life, from the beginning, in the following list:

1706: He is born, in Boston, and baptized in the Old South Church.

1714: At the age of 8 enters the grammar school.

1716: Becomes his father's assistant in the tallow-chandlery business.

1718: Apprenticed to his brother James, printer.

1721: Writes ballads and peddles them, in printed form in the streets; contributes, anonymously, to the New England Courant and temporarily edits that paper; becomes a free-thinker and a vegetarian.

1723: Breaks his indenture and removes to Philadelphia; obtains employment in Keimer's printing office; abandons vegetarianism.

1724: Is persuaded by Governor Keith to establish himself independently and goes to London to buy type; works at his trade there, and publishes Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain.

1726: Returns to Philadelphia; after serving as clerk in a drygoods store, becomes manager of Keimer's printing house.

1727: Founds the Junto, or Leathern Apron Club.

1728: With Hugh Meredith, opens a printing office.

1729: Becomes proprietor and editor of the Pennsylvania Gazette; prints, anonymously, Nature and Necessity of a Paper Currency; opens a stationer's shop.

1730: Marries Rebecca Read.

1731: Founds the Philadelphia Library.

1732: Publishes the first number of Poor Richard's Almanac under the pseudonym of "Richard Saunders." The Almanac, which continued for 25 years to contain his witty, worldlywise sayings, played a very large part in bringing together and molding the American character which was at that time made up of so many diverse and scattered types.

1733: Begins to study French, Italian, Spanish, and Latin.

1736: Chosen clerk of the general assembly; forms the Union Fire Company of Philadelphia.

1737: Elected to the assembly; appointed Deputy Postmaster General; plans a city police.

1742: Invents the open, or "Franklin," stove.

1743: Proposes a plan for an academy, which is adopted 1749 and develops into the University of Pennsylvania.

1744: Establishes the American Philosophical Society.

1746: Publishes a pamphlet, Plain Truth, on the necessity for disciplined defense, and forms a military company; begins electrical experiments.

1748: Sells out his printing business; is appointed on the Commission of the Peace, chosen to the common council, and to the assembly.

1749: Appointed a commissioner to trade with the Indians.

1751: Aids in founding a hospital.

1752: Experiments with a kite and discovers that lightning is an electrical discharge.

1753: Awarded the Copley medal for this discovery, and elected a member of the Royal Society; receives the degree of M. A. from Yale and Harvard. Appointed joint Postmaster General.

1754: Appointed one of the commissioners from Pennsylvania to the Colonial Congress at Albany; proposes a plan for the union of the colonies.

1755: Pledges his personal property in order that supplies may be raised for Braddock's army; obtains a grant from the assembly in aid of the Crown Point expedition; carries through a bill establishing a voluntary militia; is appointed colonel, and takes the field.

1757: Introduces a bill in the assembly for paving the streets of Philadelphia; publishes his famous Way to Wealth; goes to England to plead the cause of the assembly against the proprietaries; remains as agent for Pennsylvania; enjoys the friendship of the scientific and literary men of the kingdom.

1760: Secures from the Privy Council, by a compromise, a decision obliging the proprietary estates to contribute to the public revenue.

1762: Receives the degree of LL. D. from Oxford and Edinburgh; returns to America.

1763: Makes a 5 months' tour of the northern Colonies for the purpose of inspecting the post offices.

1764: Defeated by the Penn faction for reelection to the assembly; sent to England as agent for Pennsylvania.

1765: Endeavors to prevent the passage of the Stamp Act.

1766: Examined before the House of Commons relative to the passage of the Stamp Act; appointed agent of Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Georgia; visits Gottingen University.

1767: Travels in France and is presented at court.

1769: Procures a telescope for Harvard College.

1772. Elected associe etranger of the French academy.

1774: Dismissed from the office of Postmaster General; influences Thomas Paine to emigrate to America.

1775: Returns to America; chosen a delegate to the Second Continental Congress; placed on the committee of secret correspondence; appointed one of the commissioners to secure the cooperation of Canada.

1776: Placed on the committee to draft a Declaration of Independence; chosen president of the constitutional committee of Pennsylvania; sent to France as agent of the Colonies.

1778: Concludes treaties of defensive alliance, and of unity and commerce; is received at court.

1779: Appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to France.

1780: Appoints Paul Jones commander of the Alliance.

1782: Signs the preliminary articles of peace.

1783: Signs the definite treaty of peace.

1785: Returns to America; is chosen President of Pennsylvania; reelected 1786.

1787: Reelected President; sent as delegate to the convention for framing a Federal Constitution.

1788: Retires from public life.

1790: April 17, dies. His grave is in the churchyard at Fifth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Let me appropriately call attention to the fact that a half century after the death of Benjamin Franklin, the Congress of the United States was preparing the decoration of this Capitol, and for the Presidential Room selected for one of the murals a portrait of Benjamin Franklin as the emblem of the master of statecraft and diplomacy, exactly as the Senator from Pennsylvania today has so happily pointed out. The fact that that generation recognized Franklin's great talents, a half century after his passing, may well come home to us in the troubles of the present day.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maine for his very fine and pertinent comment and suggestion.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think the entire Senate should thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for the remarks he has made. We should also appreciate that his remarks are most appropriate at the present time. The Senator from Pennsylvania holds a commission as a major general, and has spent most of his life in the Army of the United States. Now he comes onto the floor of the Senate to remind us that all of our ends cannot be attained merely by having arms, and that we must have other means in order to arrive at peace. I think it is very timely that at this hour the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania, who speaks with such great authority because he has spent the greater part of his life in intimate association with the armed services, should bring us this message.

Mr. MARTIN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for his very kind remarks.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, during those difficult days of our Nation's early history, while Benjamin Franklin was serving as this country's representative abroad, the citizens of a small American community wrote to him asking him to donate a bell for the tower of their newly constructed town hall. Franklin replied, "Sense is better than sound. I am sending you a gift of books from London."

Born in Boston on January 17, 1706, but claimed equally and properly by the great city of Philadelphia, Benjamin Franklin stands today, as he will surely stand throughout recorded time, as the symbol of all that is good and great and wise in American history. May we today in the solving of the problems which now confront us demonstrate that same common sense, courage, and abiding faith in freedom that characterized Benjamin Franklin during all the 84 years of his illustrious life.

EDITORIAL AND OTHER RESPONSE TO FOREIGN POLICY ADDRESS BY JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a communication which I received yesterday from Mr. John Foster Dulles, in answer to an inquiry I addressed to him, relative to the response he has had from his recent radio address.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1951.

MY DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: I have your letter of January 12 in which you ask what the editorial and other response has been to my foreign policy address of December 29. The short answer is that that speech attracted far more public attention and approval than any speech I have ever made. Many reprints have been made. One printing, I am told, is of 100,000 copies.

In New York City, where I spoke, the New York Times and Herald Tribune made my speech the subject of leading and favorable editorials, the Herald Tribune stating, "Mr. Dulles' address will rank with the great expressions of American statesmanship." In Washington, both the Post and the Star had leading and favorable editorials.

I do not patronize any clipping bureau, nor is any such service available to me, so I have no comprehensive, Nation-wide report. However, samplings which have come to my attention indicate that my speech was commented upon editorially by most of the press of the Nation and that the editorial comment has been generally favorable. See, for example, the Louisville Courier-Journal, St. Louis Post Dispatch, Dayton News, Toledo Blade, Kansas City Star, Arizona Daily Star, Wilmington Morning News, the State (Columbia, S. C.), Dallas Morning News, Winston-Salem Journal Sentinel, Boston Herald, Nashville Tennessean, St. Paul Pioneer Press, Des Moines Register, etc.

Unfavorable editorial comment, so far as I am aware, was largely confined to such persistent critics as the Chicago Tribune and affiliated newspapers.

Columnist approval, so far as has come to my attention, has been overwhelmingly favorable. Mr. Walter Lippmann, for example, called the speech "the most broadly conceived and the most penetrating which has been made in this country since the Armistice."

The personal reaction in terms of mail, telegrams, telephone calls, etc., has been favorable in a ratio of about 2 to 1. Most of the disapproving letters, however, seem to have been prompted by the unauthorized and incorrect advance news report that I planned a verbal attack on former President Hoover. A considerable number of the disapproving letters were written before I spoke or merely voiced criticism of what they wrongly assumed was my intention. The unfavorable letters quickly dropped off, as the positive and constructive aspect of my address became evident. The approving letters continue to flow in.

From the political field, the indications of approval have included both Republican and Democratic Members of Congress, Senate and House, and State governors.

From the religious field approval came from many leaders. One high Protestant official, who speaks with unique authority, said, "I think I am well within my rights when I say that the leadership of our churches would go along with you 100 percent." I had strong approval from leading dignitaries of the Catholic Church. Several Jewish leaders identified with the Conference of Christians and Jews have written me in enthusiastic support.

From the educational field, I have had letters and telegrams of approval from presidents of several of our universities and colleges. The president of one leading university, for example, wrote: "I read the text with great approval and appreciation that mounted as I read. Your paragraph about a nation that sheds its allies was a masterpiece. You have driven a path that we all can follow."

Diplomats of friendly countries here told me that my address constituted an indispensable contribution to continuing unity and confidence within the free world.

Broadly speaking, those who have personally communicated with me seem to divide as they believe in:

1. Enlightened long-term interest versus immediate material satisfaction.

2. Security to be found collectively versus security to be sought in isolation.

My speech deliberately raised these issues and on the basis of responses, in terms of numbers and of influence, I would say that it is certain that the great majority of our people are willing to make present sacrifices to secure the future, and that they recognize that security cannot be had except collectively.

In this connection the National Opinion Research Center made a public-opinion survey during the first week of January immediately following my address of December 20. It showed that 65 percent of the people thought it would be best for the future of this country if we take an active part in world affairs as against 26 percent who favored our staying out of world affairs. Seventy-one percent indicated approval of sending military supplies to the countries of Western Europe now in order to strengthen them against any future attack, and 20 percent disapproved.

I sense an honest difference of opinion and some confusion as to how to apply these principles. But I have no doubt as to the direction in which our people are prepared to go under competent leadership that they trust.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES.

EDITORIAL AND OTHER RESPONSE TO FOREIGN-POLICY ADDRESS BY HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a communication which I received a few days ago from former President Herbert Hoover in answer to an inquiry I addressed to him relative to the response he has had from his recent radio address.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 11, 1951.

The Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your request for the figures on daily press editorial attitude on the speech I made on December 20.

As you know, I gave orders to a clipping agency to send me all daily newspaper editorials, both good and bad. They have now been classified into those who gave full support, those who gave partial support, and those opposed. The following shows the results received up to last night as measured by circulation:

Total daily press circulation covered by sample: Circulation, 46,228,000, 100 percent; full-support circulation, 31,014,000, 68 percent; part-support circulation, 3,718,000, 8 percent; opposed circulation, 11,496,000, 24 percent.

Subdivided by geographical regions, measured by circulation:

New England and Middle Atlantic: Full support, 67 percent; part support, 7 percent; opposed, 26 percent.

South and South Atlantic: Full support, 32 percent; part support, 16 percent; opposed, 52 percent.

Middle West: Full support, 71 percent; part support, 10 percent; opposed, 19 percent.

Southwest, Mountain, and Pacific: Full support, 85 percent; part support, 2 percent; opposed, 13 percent.

Of the 11,496,000 opposed, 5,279,000, or 46 percent of the total opposition, came from Atlantic seaboard cities. If we deduct this number from the opposed, the remainder would show:

Full support, 75 percent; part support, 10 percent; opposed, 15 percent.

This is an indication of the voice of hinterland America. It is noticeable from these clippings that the campaign of name calling and misrepresentation is having the opposite effect from the purpose of such people. Apparently, in consequence of it, several papers have reversed their position from opposition and part support over to full support.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further routine matters? If not, morning business is concluded.

POLICY AND FAITH FOR WORLD CONFLICT

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, there is not a Senator on this floor whose mail is not full of letters from anxious, perplexed mothers and wives. Their sons and husbands are being drafted into the Armed Forces of our country for purposes which are not always clear to the writers. Or if these purposes seem to be clear they are not thought to be of sufficient gravity to warrant the disruption of daily lives, the hardships of separation and loss of bread winners, the interruption of education, and the prospect of active warfare, wounds, and death. It would seem that there rests on the Senate of the United States a necessity to determine whether the course we are pursuing is well advised in purpose and, if so, a responsibility for seeing to it that it is carried out quickly and effectively.

A number of important statements have recently been made by men high in public life who seek to give an answer to this question, which is disturbing the hearts and minds of our citizens. Of these statements, I would refer to only two—that made by ex-President Hoover, on December 20, 1950, and that offered on this floor by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] on January 5.

Mr. Hoover was deeply concerned with the heavy load which this Government and its citizens have taken on their shoulders in an effort to protect the whole world from Russian communism and despotism. He feels that this load is too great for us to bear. He says in brief that if we cannot get the major support in this undertaking from other countries, we must be prepared to retire within our own Gibraltar of the American hemisphere and let the rest of the world be overrun by the power of the Soviet Union.

He would include Great Britain in the Gibraltar, but without any clear indication as to how she is to escape conquest if she is surrounded by Soviet power on the other side of her narrow seas. He seems to suppose that South America would escape, though I feel that he underestimates the existing threat of infiltration in the Latin American Republics and the certainty of this infiltration bursting to active conquest. The prospect, therefore, that he offers is that of a fortified North American Continent, with no certainty that all the countries to the south of us, even on this continent, will remain free.

It is true that such a continent can subsist from its own resources, though only with trouble and sacrifice. Tin for our canned foods and kitchen pots and pans, uranium for atomic bombs, tea for our comfort are not easily dispensed with. Our standard of living would be lower than it is today. There would be, however, two catastrophes to which we could not easily accustom ourselves. The first would be a spiritual adjustment to the fact that we have been defeated in our hopes and actions in support of a free world. Defeat does not rest easily on a proud and once powerful people. It would affect us individually and governmentally in ways which cannot be foreseen, but all of these ways would be for the worse.

The other factor to which we would have difficulty in adjusting ourselves is that of being driven from the seas. Our respected ex-President expressed the belief that we could retain superiority in the air and on the sea. Except for the destruction of civilian populations by long-range bombing, our air superiority, unsupported by land bases, would have little meaning. As to the sea, we would be faced with scores of submarine nests lining the shores of Western Europe, Africa, and Asia. Most of our merchant marine would be sunk. The remainder would have nowhere to go. Again, our fresh-water estuaries would be filled with unused vessels. It would scarcely be worth while even to put them in "mothballs."

It seems clear to me, Mr. President, that we shall have to rule out the suggestions of our loved and respected ex-President, based though they are on a far clearer picture of the difficulties than is officially presented to us.

The other voice raised in constructive criticism was that of the senior Senator from Ohio on this floor. He plainly recognized the difficulties which Mr. Hoover saw so clearly, but he placed them in a broader frame. He was seeking the means of retaining a free world and retaining our own freedom in it. He did not appear to me to be hopeless of the possibility of maintaining that freedom. He was deeply concerned that the means we employ for that purpose should be effective and within the ability of our Nation to perform. What follows, Mr. President, is therefcre less a criticism of the proposals made by the Senator from Ohio than it is a suggested extension of them going into more detail and pointing out hopeful lines of policy and action.

The purpose to be served is that the American people shall live as a free people and preferably in a free world, for only as we live in a free world can we be entirely free ourselves.

The purpose is one to which every patriotic American citizen will subscribe. It is the purpose of every one of us as individuals. It is a purpose sufficiently high to warrant the support and sacrifices of our people. In this purpose we are at one with our Government. It is in regard to the means of carrying out this purpose that some confusion and dissension have arisen.

The means so far have been almost entirely military, though there has been some action in the field of propaganda, particularly with reference to the Voice of America. There has been some political activity as well, though, for the most part it has been in support of the military means.

Militarily, our policy sums up in the two doctrines of "containment" and "getting tough."

As a strictly military undertaking, containment is proving to be impractical, as might have been predicted from the start. It is 20,000-odd miles around the perimeter of the homeland and the adjacent activated regions within which the Soviet Government operates. This perimeter extends from Bering Straits around to the North Cape. At any point in this 20,000 miles the interior government can at will foment discord or start military action. It can keep us rushing from one threatened point to another. It can exhaust our manpower and our resources in carrying out this unsupported policy of military containment. It not only can do so, it is doing so; and in so doing it is not as yet seriously committing its own manpower and material strength. It has us at a tremendous disadvantage. It knows how to exploit that disadvantage. We are being run ragged and know that on this basis the future holds in store nothing except an indefinite extension and expansion of this exhausting process. Containment as a military undertaking is bound to ruin us.

Getting tough is related to our policy of containment. The theory was that the Soviet Government respects only power and that a determined display of power would cause the Soviet Government to recede wherever and whenever we made our display.

This childlike faith has not worked out in practice. Not only are we limited in our physical capacity to get tough but we are restrained by moral scruples which have no effect on our Soviet opponents. For them, there is no criterion of morality except a judgment as to whether a given procedure will support the expansion of the power of the Politburo. Getting tough has its limitations, and for us the limitations are quickly reached.

Mr. President, all this is rather gloomy and would seem to indicate that we face disaster with no hope of escape. I feel, however, that that is by no means the case. There is an escape, and the route of escape has been shown us by our foes. The root lies through the use of every available means, not the military alone. A study of Soviet policy and practice also leads to the conclusion that they have developed an economy of means permitting them to carry on vast operations without corresponding commitments of their own manpower and resources. This we would do well to study and improve upon.

Our task, then, is to move in on the Politburo on all fronts at once—military, political, diplomatic, economic, spiritual, and by propaganda. We are to take the initiative. The Politburo is to be forced to the defensive. Furthermore, the full use of these associated fronts will effect that economy of means which the Soviet has devised and applied, and thus save us from the economic ruin and social disintegration on which it is counting so confidently.

Let us look first at the Asiatic sphere, in which the conflict is raging at the moment. Our criticism of the administration for its handling of this problem has been pretty severe. I think it would be well, however, if we remember that there is scarcely a Senator on this floor, on either side of the aisle, who did not applaud the decision to support by military means the people of South Korea against the aggression from the north. That decision was not primarily a military one but a political one in the broadest sense of the term "political." It was in support of the primary purpose of the United Nations, which was and is to resist aggression. We were bound to resist the invasion of South Korea. We may or may not have been wise in carrying out our obligation, but the obligation was clear to all of us if the United Nations was to survive and carry out the purposes for which it was established. It was on these grounds that the great majority of Senators, and in fact a majority of the citizens of the country, approved the action taken.

Having met with at least temporary military defeat in this undertaking, we are now faced with a decision as to whether or not we and our United Nations associates shall withdraw our forces from Korea as best we can. The considerations which rule here are the reverse of those which drew us into the conflict. The decision as to remaining or retiring is primarily a military decision and not a political one. There must be no political considerations whatsoever raised in any retirement. We must not retire for the sake of any agreement with Communist China as to membership in the United Nations, or for any other political advantage. The purity of purpose of the great undertaking incorporated in the United Nations can only be served if the question of remaining or retiring is kept completely free from political bargaining.

Korea is the Pearl Harbor of the United Nations. It represents the time and the place in which the Communist government declares itself to the world as the enemy of the principle of nonaggression. It declares itself, therefore, to be the enemy of the United Nations and of the free nations of the world which support the United Nations. That this declaration of hostility to the purposes and principles of the United Nations has so far failed of clear recognition in that body, is an astonishing fact. Day by day, week by week, we must pound home to the representatives of vacillating and self-deluded nations the significance of the attack made upon the United Nations by Communist China. The continued usefulness, the continued existence of the United Nations depends upon our doing so.

I may say, Mr. President, that I was very much disturbed when one of the leading columnists of United States journalism, on Monday, I believe, made the assertion that the United Nations should never expect to be an organization for resisting aggression, but should, on the contrary, be considered as a debating society, a forum, a place where people could talk and talk and talk. If that is all it is to be, I think we might as well decide to get out of it.

This self-revelation and self-declaration of Communist China requires action on the part of the other nations of the world. That action should come through the United Nations. It involves certainly the blockading of the coast of China. This in itself will bring no great hardship to the people of China who have always depended on their own land for the necessities of life. It can make continued aggression by Communist China much more difficult than it is at the present time. It will not be so easy to carry on large-scale aggression if the only available supplies have to come in through Russia. An active blockade will perceptibly slow down military activity in any direction—north, east, west, or south.

But the United Nations may vacillate. It may not promptly authorize a blockade. It certainly will not do so through the Council and may not do so through the Assembly. In this case, agreement must be made with the other powers principally involved, namely, England and France. England must decide whether to serve the cause of freedom or the cause of tyranny and aggression. She must decide whether to repeat her disastrous policy when faced by the Japanese invasion and seizure of Manchuria in 1931. Her commercial relations with Japan then stayed her hand and blinded her mind and her conscience. Having submitted in that instance she was in no position effectively to protest the conquering of Ethiopia by Mussolini in 1935. She was in no position to protest the conquering of the Rhineland by Hitler and the subsequent conquering of Austria. She weakly submitted to the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1938 and only resisted the invasion of Poland too late to stop the Second World War.

The conscience and judgment of the British people must be focused on the high issues involved in Great Britain's possession and use of the island of Hong Kong. The public opinion of the world must be focused upon and support the pressure from conscientious and intelligent citizens of Great Britain on their irresolute government. This issue must be so sharply drawn that her government shall have no alternative but to serve its own interests and the interests of its people in sacrificing the paltry millions or billions of the Hong Kong trade to the great purpose of maintaining the free world.

The next problem which has to be faced in the Asiatic area is as to whether or not use shall be made of the Nationalist forces in Formosa. This problem is not a simple one. Against a recollection of corruption in the past we have to balance a confession of misguided attempts by us to form a coalition with the Communists. We have to consider likewise the well-nigh universal report from Formosa that the Nationalist army is high in morale, reasonably well cleared of graft and that the government of the island is to a reasonable degree acceptable to its inhabitants. This seems to add up to the conclusion that the leader has learned his lesson and is able to apply it. We must not expect perfection, but it seems reasonable to expect very greatly improved performance by the Nationalists, both militarily and governmentally.

The question before us is as to whether they shall have our support in activating and supplying the guerrilla forces in mainland China, and whether as a further step we shall assist in the landing of Nationalist forces in bodies small or large on the shore of the mainland.

As a political question this would seem to be technically allowable so long as the Nationalist Government is recognized as a member of the United Nations. They should properly remain members so long as Communist China is not admitted; and Communist China cannot be admitted without destroying the United Nations so long as it maintains its aggressive status, whether recognized or unrecognized as such.

In all this we must be governed by the reactions of the Chinese people themselves. This relates not merely to willingness to make a new trial of the Nationalist Government, but particularly as to whether such action would tend to consolidate opposition to the Communist government. Most of the information coming out of China seems to indicate growing opposition to the Communist government. Should that turn out to be the case, the ground is already prepared for useful intervention on the mainland by the Nationalist armies.

But these are not the only things to be considered. To the extent that there has been real agrarian reform we must have assurances that any programs for splitting up large land holdings into peasant ownership will be maintained. We must be sure that the return of the Nationalist armies does not bring a return of the great feudal estates. The army must be one of true liberation. This must be clearly understood beforehand.

The great objection to this program is that we may find ourselves at war with Communist China. That government might conceivably declare war on us were we to support the program just described. If that meant we would have to invade them and set out for a conquest of the great Chinese Empire, by ourselves or with what allies we could scrape together, the undertaking would be ruinous. We must not make the attempt.

We must in fact make it clear that we have no designs of our own on Chinese territory or resources. We can blockade their government against outside supplies. We can support a return of Nationalist Chinese to China. But we do not have to engage in an attack of our own. In fact, we must not do so no matter how badly the Nationalist project may be going. Here we have an opportunity to firmly maintain a policy of economy of means. We will permit and will supply some of the necessary resources for an occupation of China by the Chinese. We will not waste our own manpower on the hopeless undertaking of conquering China.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am very much interested in what the Senator from Vermont is now discussing. Assume that we liberated the Nationalist Chinese from Formosa and put them on the mainland. I think it is generally conceded that we would have to support them with naval and air forces, and would have to supply them.

Mr. FLANDERS. That is doubtless true.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Supposing it became difficult for us, under developing circumstances in other directions, either to maintain the blockade or to provide the supplies, thus leaving the Nationalist forces on the mainland of China in a rather precarious position, would we not be accused throughout Asia of having deserted an ally? That is the first point.

The corollary is that if the Nationalist Chinese troops landed on the mainland of China and ran into disaster, would there not be an enormous moral pressure, at least, on this country to supplement the Nationalist Chinese forces with forces of our own? If we refused to furnish such forces, would we not be accused of having run out on an ally? I should appreciate the Senator's observations on that point very much.

Mr. FLANDERS. There is much wisdom in the questions raised by the Senator from Colorado. He states certain contingencies which we must consider. In the first place, it would seem to me that our relationship to the Nationalist Government of China would have to be, not of inciting them to activity, but of supporting them on their own strong pleas. In other words, we must be in the position of having been urged to support them, instead of being in the position of urging them to move. That point must be clear on the record, and it must be clear in fact. Unless the Nationalist Government is prepared to move and is prepared to take the initiative in such an undertaking, we must stand clear of it.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Even assuming that the Nationalist Chinese said, "We want only so much help from you, and not more," and supposing that fact were publicized to the ends of the earth, would the mass feeling in Asia be changed by that fact? I mean would it not be simple to point out that in our own self-interest we had stimulated the Nationalist Chinese into going to the mainland of China, but that when they had run into disaster, out of supplies, or had run out of our embargo, because we might not be able to continue it, would not the word be passed all over Asia that the United States had pushed the Nationalist Chinese into a war on the mainland and then had run out on them? I mean as a practical matter.

Mr. FLANDERS. The practical questions, it seems to me, largely hinge on whether we can make the case publicly and honestly that we are being asked and urged, instead of doing the asking and urging ourselves. There is one other thought I should like to express at this point, and that is that we must have the assurance, as I mentioned a little while ago, that the return of the Nationalists to the mainland of China will not involve a back-tracking on any agrarian reform which has been going on in China, but that the Nationalist Government will be committed to a continuance of it. That puts the question in a little different aspect than would be the case if we urged the Nationalist Chinese to return to the mainland. At least it seems so to me.

One other point is that in this respect we find ourselves sensitive in a way in which the members of the Politburo do not have to be sensitive. The Politburo has established principles which permit it to try in one place, for example, and if the effort does not succeed, to withdraw; then to try at another place, and if that effort does not succeed, to withdraw again. One of our problems is to establish the waging of the contest for freedom on something of the same basis. I must say that, because of our sensitivity and the wrong position in which we find ourselves with Asiatic nations, it is rather difficult for us to do so. However, that is one of the problems to which we must address ourselves.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FLANDERS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia after the Senator from Colorado has concluded his series of observations.

Mr. MILLIKIN. First, I should like to register disagreement with the proposition that, as a quid pro quo for our assistance of the type that we have been discussing we should lay down conditions as to the kind of government that should be established in China. However, that is a large subject, and I shall not plague the Senator with it at the present time.

Mr. FLANDERS. I may say to the Senator from Colorado that I shall address myself further in support of the idea in the remaining portion of my address, not with specific reference to China, but with specific reference to the part that we play in the politics of the world.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If I may be permitted to make the observation, I would rather have a corrupt and inefficient ally on our Pacific flank than a murderous, honest, and efficient enemy on our flank. However, be that as it may, that was not the reason why I intervened. Certain difficulties present themselves in our being half in and half out of a war, or in starting a war and then pulling out of it before it is finished. Our premise assumes that we are doing something which would clearly authorize Communist China to declare war on us, to wit, that we are giving naval support and air support, and furnishing supplies.

Mr. FLANDERS. That is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That makes us a coadventurer with Nationalist China. Therefore I go back to my original question: Can we speculate? Can we, while maintaining our prestige, go in with Nationalist Chinese, and withdraw at will, without doing the very thing that we do not want to do, to wit, lose the respect of all of Asia and perhaps a considerable part of the rest of the world?

Mr. FLANDERS. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that the problem seems to me to be finding the means of placing ourselves in the position of doing the most effective things, whatever they may be, so long as they are not dishonorable, in support of the major undertaking of a free America in a free world. It would seem to me to be largely a matter of presenting our purposes and our means before the bar of the world, rather than trying to save face on each element of a given situation. This will involve, as I suggest and shall continue to suggest, pressure on Soviet Russia from every imaginable direction, by every imaginable means, continuously, day in and day out, week in and week out, month in and month out, and year in and year out. In other words, it is an all-out contest by every possible means. My guess is that we should be able to justify ourselves in this pragmatic approach to the problem if the total purpose is completely revealed and completely understood.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLIKIN. May I ask one more question?

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The distinguished Senator has placed himself on record on what I think is a very inspiring theme, to wit, the necessity for the United Nations to act with honor, which is contrary to the way it has been acting so far as the aggression in Korea is concerned. Would we be acting in good honor, knowing in advance that the Nationalist Chinese forces in Formosa are most likely unable to wage successful war on the mainland of China out of their own strength, and knowing in advance that for them to wage a successful war on the mainland they must have our naval help, our air support, and the help of our supplies, could we, in good honor, after committing them to that kind of an adventure, pull out and say, "Well, boys, it did not work; we are going back home"?

I am not taking a position. I am trying to work this out in my own mind. Where would we be? Suppose there were a disaster on the mainland of China. Suppose they were driven back again. What would be our position of honor? What would be our moral position, so far as sustaining those troops is concerned? Could we wash our hands of the matter and say, "It is too bad. We made it clear when we went in that we might run out on you, and we are running out on you"? Where would we stand with ourselves? I am talking about saving our own face. Where would we stand with ourselves if we got into that kind of a situation? What is the criticism that we are leveling at our partners in the United Nations for doing the same sort of thing so far as our action in Korea is concerned?

Mr. FLANDERS. That, however, is a question of principles, and not of tactics or strategy. It seems to me that we can maintain our position on the basis of principles, that we can clearly state our relationship to the desire on the part of the Nationalist forces to have their chance, and clear ourselves on that score, as a practical matter, in advance.

I do not know whether that answer will satisfy the Senator from Colorado, but I am strongly of the feeling that the Russians have developed a technique which they are able to use effectively, and it seems to me that we must develop the same possibilities in our own technique, stopping short only at the barrier raised at the question of deceit or honesty. That is where we stop in following the Russians.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It may well be, I respectfully suggest, that we may have to adopt some of the tactics of our enemies. At the same time, we cannot talk about honor and morality for one part of our endeavor, and forsake honor and morality in other parts of our endeavor. Oh, we can, and we do; but I am still wondering whether we should.

Mr. FLANDERS. The question between the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Vermont seems to me to be as to whether we can make our position clear in advance, so that our honor and morality cannot be questioned, and apply ourselves to the purely practical and pragmatic task of trying to make as much trouble for Russia as possible, with the hope and expectation that in the long run it will be good for the people of China as well.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Would we be in a defensible position if we were to encourage someone to get into a fight which he would be bound to lose without our continued help, and then withdrew our continued help? Would we be in a position of high honor and morals if we were to withdraw? What would be the effect on the one whom we had encouraged to open the fight, and whom we had forsaken; and what would be the effect on the world in general—particularly those parts of the world whose minds and hearts we wish to conquer?

Mr. FLANDERS. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that there is a great difference in my own mind between the words "help" and "encourage." We must keep that distinction in mind in connection with the Chinese Nationalist possibility.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I suggest that the Chinese Nationalists would, of course, want to go on the mainland if they knew that they had our help and encouragement. I am quite sure that they would ask us for help and encouragement. Thus we might say, "We have gone into this only because you have asked us to do so." But we also come down to the hard reality of having gone along with this plan for our own benefit. Where do we stand when we forsake our allies?

Mr. FLANDERS. That is the question between the Senator and myself. As I have previously stated, I am taking a little from the book of the Politburo, always stopping short of deceit. That involves a real understanding, both on the part of the Nationalists and on the part of the rest of the world, as to what is going on.

I wonder if the Senator from Colorado will permit me to yield to other Senators. Then, refreshed—he may even use my glass of water—he can return to the discussion.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I have not yet tired.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Vermont is making an exceptionally fine speech, to which I have listened with great interest. I wish to express my approval of the striking way in which he posed the issue confronting the United Nations, when he said that Korea was the Pearl Harbor of the United Nations.

Mr. FLANDERS. May I interrupt for a moment to say that my speech gets better from here on? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I shall make my observations very brief in order to hear the best part of the Senator's speech.

There is only one suggestion to which I wish to lead up. We all know—and I was a supporter of Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations—that the League of Nations failed when confronted with the aggression of Mussolini in Ethiopia and the aggression of the Japanese war lords in Manchuria, and when Hitler violated the Versailles Treaty by fortifying the Rhine. Three times an organization formed to stay the hand of the aggressor ran out on the problem. We said, "We are not going to make the same mistake twice." The distinguished Senator from Vermont has very clearly stated that if the United Nations had run out on this problem it would have been only a debating society.

I agree with him that it was a political decision. I agree with him that the question of whether or not we should now withdrawn from Korea is a military decision. The Senator from Vermont did not see fit to discuss—and I shall not inject it into his speech—the question of whether or not, as intimated by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], our allies provided the measure of help which we anticipated when they voted for us to make a stand under the United Nations flag. In my opinion, many of them gave us only token help.

This is the point I am coming to: If I correctly understood the distinguished Senator from Vermont, he was proceeding to analyze the pros and cons of our giving active support to the Nationalists in Formosa in making an attack upon the mainland of China. I did not understand him to say that after reviewing all the pros and cons he is now advocating that step, but he has mentioned it. At that point the distinguished Senator from Colorado referred to some hazards which would be involved. Has the distinguished Senator from Vermont fully reflected upon those hazards?

I did not understand the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Colorado to mention another hazard which I think would be involved, and that is what I understand to be the defensive alliance between the Soviet Union and the Chinese Government, in accordance with the terms of which the Soviet Union would render military support to China if attacked. I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Vermont, therefore, before he comes to the very fine part of his speech, which I await with great interest, if he will not include a discussion of the question whether or not we would be then and there at war with Russia, not only in China, but on the continent of Europe, or wherever she might see fit to wage such a war. If we send our Navy and our Air Force in support of the Nationalists of China against the Reds of China, and the Russians come in with their air force, their submarines, and whatever else they may choose to send into the conflict, are we not then at war with Russia?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word or two in response to the question of the Senator from Virginia. What he suggests is, of course, one of the possibilities which we face. There is one axiom which I think we can have reason to believe is firmly fixed in the minds of the Politburo, that is, not to wage war on two fronts. Their interior position perhaps gives them advantages in doing that. But I think we can be quite sure that they will not wage serious war both in Asia and in Europe. If they are going to war, they will take those fronts seriatim instead of together.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point, because I think there should be mentioned a bit of information which has come over the wires since the able Senator from Vermont started his address, to which we have been listening with great interest. According to both the Associated Press and the United Press, the Peking radio is at the present time or was at the time they picked it up, broadcasting Communist China's answer to the latest UN cease-fire proposal, and according to the two wire services, as it appears on the ticker in the anteroom, Chou en-Lai, Chinese Foreign Ambassador, has rejected the proposal. Whether they have offered counterproposals or not has not come in over the wire.

I might merely point out to the able Senator, who in his discussion with the Senator from Colorado has raised some very pertinent points, that there are certain things to be considered. Number one: It seems to me that in connection with any policy which the Government of the United States might develop we should have as much factual information as is possible. It was for that reason that the Senator from California some time ago suggested that it would be wise if a competent American mission—and I merely suggested a man of the caliber of General Wedemeyer, who is thoroughly familiar with the Far East and is, I think, one of the ablest strategists in the American Army—were sent to Formosa personally to go over the condition of the troops there, and to secure accurate information which I think we should always have before embarking upon a policy. I can say without fear of contradiction that I am sure the government of the Republic of China on Formosa would welcome such a mission; would throw open to him all the facilities so that he could get not only the information as to the morale and the training of their more than 500,000 troops on that island, but also the condition of their supplies and their munitions and so forth, which means help to answer some of the questions raised by the Senator from Colorado.

The second thing it seems to me we should constantly keep in mind is that, as of today at least, the government of the Republic of China is a member of the United Nations—this point has been brought out by the Senator from Vermont—it is a permanent member of the Security Council, and of the 60 members of the United Nations, all but 17 recognize it as the legal government of the country. So that it would appear to me that in international law and otherwise, in view of the fact that the Chinese Communist regime is making war upon the United Nations in Korea by an act of aggression, we would be on sound ground if we furnished supplies to the legal government of the country, not only for the defense of Formosa but also for such raids upon the Chinese coast as the quality and quantity of their troops would permit. That would furnish diversionary action, and would not permit the concentration of Chinese troops for the purpose of throwing the United States Eighth Army and the United Nations forces in Korea back into the sea.

Mr. FLANDERS. I thank the Senator from California for his observation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to associate myself with the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]——

Mr. FLANDERS. Physically he has run out on the Senator.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What happened to him? As I started to say, I should like to associate myself with the distinguished Senator from Virginia in his praise of the Senator's remarks regarding the attitude of the United Nations toward the cease-fire proposition. I think it represents an act of degradation, and I feel that it may be the beginning of the end of the United Nations. It does not help the case any to say that we figured the proposal would not be accepted. The boys who are dying in Korea deserve better than that kind of a silly diplomatic minuet.

Mr. FLANDERS. I associate myself with the Senator from Colorado in that sentiment.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thank the Senator very much. I wish to say that I am not arguing any position here, but I am very much concerned about the possible benefits and dangers of intervention of Nationalist China, and I am trying to get the facts upon which to reach a conclusion.

I wish also to congratulate the Senator from Vermont upon being willing to engage in debate upon the subject. We talk about this as "a great debate." In the main part, this consists of a series of great affirmations undisturbed and uninfluenced by debate. May I congratulate the Senator on his being willing to interrupt the consecutive quality of his speech for the sake of throwing light around this Chamber?

Mr. FLANDERS. I express my appreciation both of the sentiments of the Senator from Colorado and of the language in which he expresses them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may give some information to the Senate, and also, perhaps, throw more light on the debate and discussion which is taking place?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have in my hand some matter which came over the ticker subsequent to the earlier dispatch which I mentioned. It says:

Chou—

The Chinese Foreign Minister—

offered a counterproposal. He said he would take part in a seven-nation conference to discuss Korea and all far eastern problems. He stipulated that the conference should be held in China. Participating would be Communist China, Russia, Britain, the United States, France, India, and Egypt.

But first, he said, all foreign troops must be withdrawn from Korea.

Chou made these demands:

1. Withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea and settlement of the problem of Korea's international administration by the Korean people as the premise upon which the countries concerned would confer and endeavor to bring an early end to the Korean war.

2. That withdrawal of United States Armed Forces from Formosa and the Straits of Formosa and problems concerning the Far East will be included in the conference.

3. The countries to take part in the conference will be the Peoples Republic of China, Soviet Russia, England, the United States, France, India, and Egypt.

I might say parenthetically at that point, my recollection is, of course, that the Soviet Union has constantly urged that Red China be seated in the United Nations, and that Formosa be turned over to Red China. Of course, Communist China itself subscribes to that point of view. Great Britain has already urged that the Chinese Communists be seated in the United Nations, and, as a matter of fact, has been one of the leading nations that has prevented the United Nations from declaring Communist China to be the aggressor. India has constantly not only recognized but also urged that Red China be admitted into the United Nations. Accordingly, so far as I can see on the face of it, of the seven nations mentioned, four of them have definitely stated in advance that practically all the demands which Communist China has been making should be acceded to before she even enters the conference. That is the end of the parenthetical discussion on that point.

4. That the legal status of the Peoples Republic of China in the United Nations will be decided by the seven-nation conference.

Again going back to the fact that of the seven nations at least four are already committed, and perhaps they have some secret understandings with some of the others.

Mr. FLANDERS. The Senator did not mention Egypt.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Pardon me. The Peoples Republic of China, Soviet Russia, England, the United States, France, India, and Egypt.

Mr. FLANDERS. I think we can count Egypt in.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes. So at least four, and possibly five, of the seven already are fairly well determined as to their position in regard to Communist China's admission into the United Nations and, probably, the turning over of the 7,500,000 free people of Formosa to the tender mercies of the Chinese Communists.

I already have read, I believe, this portion of the dispatch:

4. That the legal status of the Peoples Republic of China in the United Nations will be decided by the seven-nation conference.

In other words, it will be taken out of the hands of the 60 members of the United Nations, and will be decided by a conference of seven nations, at least a majority of whom already have expressed their opinion on the subject. So the "jury" will be "packed," even before the conference begins.

The dispatch concludes with the following:

5. That the seven-nation conference will be held in China.

So the representatives of those nations will, in an abject way, with their hats in their hands, go to that conference, and will wish to give the Communist China aggressors all they have sought for; and they want those assurances before they will consider the latest United Nation's proposal.

Mr. FLANDERS. I will say to the Senator from California that it would seem that that proposal is so preposterous that our representative in the United Nations would not touch it at all, not even with a 10-foot pole.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that up until the time when the representative of the United States in the United Nations voted recently, I would have agreed with the Senator from Vermont. However, it seems to me the proposal then agreed to is so preposterous and such a great weakening of our moral position, that I greatly fear the later proposal may also be agreed to. I join with the Senator from Vermont in hoping that that will not be so; but I say to him that if these proposals were accepted, they would, in fact, be an instrument of surrender which the government of the Communist regime in China had presented to the nations of the free world, so that they could make an abject surrender, at gun's point, to the aggression which the Communist regime already has conducted.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, we have had debate. I hope we shall continue to have debate, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, because on this question what we need is debate, rather than simple oratory. I am grateful to the Senator from Colorado for having introduced a real element which has to be considered.

Mr. President, I am not quite clear in my mind just where I stopped reading my prepared manuscript, so I shall ask the Official Reporter to correct any hiatus or any overlapping, as the case may be, when I resume with the presentation of my prepared remarks.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator from Vermont was just about to come to the gems which he had thus far withheld from us.

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes; my presentation becomes "gemier" as it proceeds.

Mr. President, a few words more may be said with regard to other threatened areas in Asia.

While the fortunes of guerrilla warfare go up and down in Indochina, for the moment the Communist forces there seem to be in retreat. Militarily speaking, those forces can be weakened by the engagement of the forces of Communist China with Nationalist infiltration. The engagement of those forces will help the situation there, as well as the situation in Korea.

We must recognize that in Indochina, as in other parts of Asia, the great desire of the people is for freedom. We must not oppose this idea; we must support it. In Indochina, as in Indonesia, there is needed the same recognition of the aspirations of the people which was brought about by the mediation between the Netherlands Government and the Indonesians which was carried to so successful a conclusion by our own former associate on this floor, Senator Frank Graham, of North Carolina. In the establishment of the Indonesian Republic he has a living monument to his devotion. There is needed a similar undertaking as between the French and the people of Indochina.

While I am not familiar with all that is going on politically in that disturbed area, there are many indications that recent successes of the French may be due to a decision on their part that freedom for their former colony is desirable and necessary. Economically there will never be any hope that France can draw a net profit from its possession of Indochina. As a free nation trading with a free nation, there is every hope that their long experience may lead to commercial relationships which are mutually profitable. The dealings of free people with each other benefit all. That is one of the ideals toward which our world policy must persist in leading the world.

To assist in the stabilizing of a free Asia, we have the resources of a point-4 program available to them and to us. This program, wisely carried out, can lead to satisfied social conditions in southeast Asia and retain that great area, rich in natural resources, within the boundaries of the free world. Economic and spiritual forces can pay off where military expenditures alone and unsupported are hopeless. This is the dollars-and-cents balance-sheet expression of the advantages of morally right policies. Our self-interest, if of sufficiently long range, will be found to be in parallel with, rather than in opposition to, policies determined on a profound moral basis.

In this brief résumé of the problems of the Pacific area, Mr. President, they have been treated as though they were self-contained and could be considered without reference to the threatening aspects of Soviet policy in other parts of the world. This is only partly true. It is true only to the extent that certain special problems which have to be specially considered are involved here. The relationships with threatened aggression in southern and western Asia and in Europe are real and they are clear. They relate, first of all, to the status and usefulness of the United Nations. This point has already been covered. They relate almost as obviously to making sure that the Soviet Government cannot stir up trouble anywhere in the world without herself becoming involved. She has been starting trouble and getting away with it. She must not be allowed to set fires without getting scorched. If we can make sure that this is done, we can make sure that her own involvement may be at least as embarrassing to her as it is to the rest of us. That is the advantage of the general policy I am suggesting, namely, of moving in on her on all fronts, leaving the military front as a last resource in case of open war. We can put continuous and exhausting pressure on her before final military attack, as I shall endeavor further to show.

Trouble has really broken out in Eastern Asia. We see it. We feel it. We know it. There are a large number of other places in which it may break out, as the judgment of the Politburo may decide. These men determine the program. We respond to their call. There are some signs that the next point of attack may be in Iran. There certainly is uncertainty at the present moment in our relations with that country. The foreign experts sent to help them, with their 5-year plan have resigned and are coming home. A trade treaty, which has been negotiated by Iran with the Soviet Republic, may be harmless in itself, but more probably contains the seeds of future strife and disaffection.

Mr. President, I am not going to prescribe for this trouble in Iran. I make no claim to omniscience. I do not have access to the same amount of information, nor have I thought as long on that information, in the case of Iran as I have in the case of China and the Far East.

Only one thing seems clear, and that is that we must not permit the oil of Iran, Iraq, or any other part of the Near East to go to Russia. This is not because in times of peace we should deny to anyone access on equal commercial terms to any source of supply the world over. It is only that Russia is a determined aggressor; and, as such, it should be the object of all peace-loving nations, including ourselves, to handicap her in her military operations. A peaceful Russia would have quite other treatment at our hands.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, may I take the great liberty of asking the Senator from Vermont to yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It might be helpful to point out that in Iran, any opposition that might come would be directly against the arms of Russia, and the satellite process would not be involved there.

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes. So far as it was done by military pressure, it would come directly from Russia. I think that might lead us to expect that it would be done by other means. Unless Russia is ready to start a major armed conflict, a peaceful Russia would have quite other treatment at our hands.

As to Europe, Mr. Hoover and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] sounded a much needed warning. We cannot carry on our own shoulders the burden of protecting the cradle and seat of western civilization. The countries of Europe must really want to be protected from invasion and tyranny and must be willing to do their utmost. When they are doing their part, our part can assure them of safety which neither they nor we, working alone, would be able to provide.

But let us not cry over milk which has not yet been spilled. Particularly, let us not neglect the several other things which can be done while the nations of Europe go through the political and economic throes which must be endured as they are building up their forces of defense.

Take, for instance, the question of German rearmament. That is a question difficult to solve in an effective way without arousing the fears of nations like France, who have been more than once conquered and overrun by that warlike nation. If, however, we remember that Hitler in the years subsequent to World War I made his great conquests by infiltration and used his armies mainly as the visible symbol of a conquest already made—if we remember these things, we can find a useful service for Western Germany to perform, while the knotty problem of rearming her is being worked out.

For hundreds of miles stretches the barrier and boundary between free West Germany and subjugated East Germany. The peoples on the two sides of that boundary speak the same language. They have a common history. They have, or had until modified by the Russians, common social and political institutions.

On the other hand, some of these same Germans or their predecessors were exceedingly adept under the Hitler regime in crossing boundary lines, infiltrating populations, making the position of the rulers of the countries, particularly Austria and Czechoslovakia, very difficult to maintain, and ultimately arriving at the time when these areas could be occupied by the triumphant armies of Hitler.

Have the Germans lost all knowledge of the art of infiltration? Can they revive it? If so, without masses of arms and years of training for her soldiers, the West Germans can make the position of the Russians in East Germany quite untenable. Without a mighty army, the Germans themselves can unite Germany if the impulse to do so comes from West Germany. This is the task to which these words of ours must address themselves. For this undertaking they should have complete freedom. They should have such necessary backing of funds and equipment as may be necessary. The cost will not be large. Here, indeed, is an opportunity for economy of means. Let the Germans reunite Germany, and in so doing push the area of combat far to the east of the Rhine.

Since writing this address, Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article in the February Reader's Digest, by Mr. O. K. ARMSTRONG, who is a newly elected Representative from Missouri, and who had the very valuable experience of spending some months in Germany. He came into intimate contact with the Bundestag, and even addressed it. In this copy of the Reader's Digest, there is a condensation from the New Leader of an article entitled, "The Man the Russians Fear Most in Germany." It is a description of the work done by a certain Rainer Hildebrandt, leader of an organization which calls itself The Fighters for Humanity. I shall not undertake to describe what he was doing, but I ask that every Senator obtain a copy of the latest issue of the Reader's Digest and read the article. I may say that Mr. Hildebrandt appeared in my office a few days ago, and that I was tremendously impressed with the possibilities of what he is doing. It is exactly along the lines which I had already suggested in my manuscript. I see no reason why it cannot be multiplied and intensified, and I feel very strongly indeed that it should be a major undertaking of our State Department in Western Germany.

Again, while complaining that our allies do not build up their armed strength, suppose we cast our eyes on the hundreds of thousands of displaced people in West Germany whose numbers are being augmented daily by those who escape across the boundary from the captured countries. I understand, by the way, that there has been, for some reason, a little thinning of that stream of escapees. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has endeavored to get these possibilities explored and exploited. Why not do so? Instead of moaning and complaining about the inadequacy of the armies of Western Europe let us free this great mass of unemployed men to positions of trust and responsibility in guarding western civilization. We can furnish the arms and equipment.

Here again we have an economy of means by using a great human asset which we are now disregarding.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Some time ago, I believe there occurred on the Senate floor a discussion regarding the possibility of bringing into our own Army acceptable material from displaced persons. There was much talk at the time, which certainly had a great deal of surface appeal. Does the Senator know what has happened to that suggestion?

Mr. FLANDERS. I have tried to find out from the junior Senator from Massachusetts. I do not want to quote him, but I came to the conclusion that he was as much puzzled as the Senator from Colorado and I are.

Mr. MILLIKIN. As I recall, as of that time there were large numbers of Poles who had demonstrated fighting ability. There were large numbers of displaced Germans who, in return for admission into our military forces and the ultimate reward of citizenship, might make very fine soldiers and, ultimately, very fine citizens for us. I have been wondering what happened to the suggestion regarding them. Perhaps there might be 150,000 or 200,000 available recruits in those categories, and thus our own manpower burdens here at home would be lessened, while aiding our own military strength.

Mr. FLANDERS. I say to the Senator from Colorado that I join him in wonder, and I hope that we can find out something about that proposal.

Mr. MILLIKIN. There may be some good reason why action along that line has not been taken, but no one, so far as I know, has come forth with the reason or at least exposed it publicly.

Mr. FLANDERS. There is, of course, the question as to whether these men should be incorporated into the United States Army, which raises the question of standards of pay, and so on, and without citizenship. There could be, however, an agreement among members of the Northern Atlantic Pact that such might be used in an army, not a national army, but one directly under the command of the Commander in Chief. That is another possibility.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I was not thinking so much of the latter type of army, because that involves some very deep questions. So far as Germany is concerned, it involves military participation without Germany at the same time securing full sovereignty. That is a very distasteful thing to many Germans. I am thinking of holding out citizenship, the high-pay and American standards of living for recruiting acceptable material from displaced persons in Europe.

Mr. FLANDERS. Would the Senator reject the notion of an army which is a volunteer army—not an armed force in any way—which has not been promised citizenship and which is directly under the command of the commanding general of the western forces?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I do not reject it. I would want to do some thinking about it. But I already know in advance that there would be a great deal of opposition to it. The Germans have already indicated very clearly that they do not favor that kind of a scheme. They want to trade, and it is very natural for them to want to do so, and they want the restoration of full sovereignty.

Mr. FLANDERS. Would they feel the same way about the enlistment of Poles, Czechs, Hungarians, and Russians?

Mr. MILLIKIN. That I do not know.

Mr. FLANDERS. It would seem to me there is an area there to be explored and considered.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The real basis of my question is my wonderment that we have not been given more information pro or con on the subject.

Mr. FLANDERS. Proposals such as these die a death from mysterious causes, and there is no coroner's jury that sits on the cause of the death. I think the Senate may as well constitute itself a coroner's jury on this project. Of course, we are in a new Congress, and if the Senator from Massachusetts will reintroduce his measure, perhaps we can have it considered under more favorable conditions than was the case in the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am not prepared to advocate it. I simply want to know what is the matter with it, if there is anything the matter with it.

Mr. FLANDERS. Perhaps we can get a real debate on that subject.

Mr. President, I am now referring to a matter which has already been touched on in the colloquy with the Senator from Colorado.

Here again we have an "economy of means" by using a great human asset which we are not disregarding. That economy goes further than simple numbers of men because these soldiers can be well equipped and well paid on the basis of European standards without having to have the money spent on them that we spend on our American soldiers. The standards are different. The colloquy we have just had indicates that the subject is one to which further thought may well be given.

I mention only one other recourse for getting manpower. Both Sweden and Switzerland should be approached and reasoned with continuously, with the hope of persuading them to join with the other nations of Western Europe. They will ultimately have to join or be destroyed should there be a third world war. There can be no neutrals in that war as there have been in the past.

Many hundreds of thousands of effective forces would be added if these two nations would join their neighbors in this matter. There are problems of detail in the case of Switzerland since in peacetime that country has no national army—only a series of provincial armies. But this problem could be overcome by specific legislation.

So here we have a reactivated and finally, perhaps, a rearmed Germany, a displaced-persons army, and new allies. While we are getting these things going, our older associates in the North Atlantic Pact should have worked out their fiscal and personnel problems.

Yugoslavia presents another problem. I suppose we could pay too high a price for arming Yugoslavia's resistance to attack from the satellites or from Russia itself. We certainly do not pay too high a price when we appropriate money for feeding the famished inhabitants of that region. Anything we do which brings us into favorable contact with people we will find to be worth doing. Wisdom in negotiation will keep the price of maintaining resistance in Yugoslavia within the limits of an economy of means, particularly since she will furnish her own manpower.

The results to be accomplished are exceedingly great. It needs but a glance at the map of the Mediterranean to see what free access to the shore line of Yugoslavia would do in providing the Soviet with submarine nests to harry and destroy the sea traffic of the Mediterranean. It must not have this shore. We have kept the Soviet from Greece. We are keeping it from Yugoslavia. It is true that there are already installations in Albania, but that country, surrounded as it is by Yugoslavia and Greece, cannot be effectively used so long as these two nations remain within the orbit of the Western World.

As to ourselves, the indications are clear from what has been said earlier. We should send a limited force to Western Europe to maintain the principle of our unity with them, at least in the 6-to-1 ratio suggested by Senators LODGE and KNOWLAND. We should send them a profusion of planes and other ordnance and equipment. So much for military plans.

An economic offensive offers many advantages. We should agree with our European allies that the blockade of the countries behind the curtain shall be absolute so far as anything we may send them is useful in preparing for or waging war. We can consider a normal peacetime interchange, such as of food from the Danube Valley, in exchange for purely consumer goods such as textiles and bicycles, for example. But nothing must get through the curtain that is applicable to the manufacture of wartime goods.

During the Second World War we developed the term and practiced preclusive buying to prevent goods of strategic value from falling into the hands of the enemy. This means that we outbid the enemy for the world supply of such things as industrial diamonds. It may be necessary to reinstitute this procedure on our part to a more complete extent than it is now operated. Nothing which supports warfare must get through the curtain. When we say nothing we must mean nothing. Our North Atlantic allies clear down the line must be as firm as we are in this matter, for it is a matter of life and death from the military standpoint. A Germany engaged in reuniting itself and recovering its old sources of food supply will understand the necessity for this. The two historically neutral countries must be dealt with continuously and strongly.

With them we may perhaps have to invent a new practice, that of preclusive selling. We may, for instance, have to offer them as good terms on fuel and on coarse grains as they can get from the Soviet sphere. We must not permit the Soviet to demand in trade agreements goods which will have military use.

This economic offensive offers great returns for moderate expenditures. In keeping Italy and France to date out of the orbit of the Politburo, the Marshall plan produced results which 10 to 20 times the expenditure for military offense or defense would not have accomplished. The Marshall plan principle must still be maintained. It is a prime factor in the maintenance of peace with an economy of means.

All of this deals with measures to be taken on this side of the curtain. On the other side there are indications that the Soviet colossus may have feet of clay. She is weaker in her western satellites than in Asia, for they have felt the full force of her tyranny. Even in Russia itself the power of the Politburo comes by compulsion, not consent. Should the Red army start to hove westward, even that mighty force might show seams and cracks.

These weaknesses we must exploit by every means—as the war is in progress if it comes, while it is in preparation if it is delayed. We must reach satellites and Russians by every means—over, under, and through the iron curtain. Let us not forget that balloons can go where men cannot. Let us make sure that that westward march will be no summer's day picnic.

Let us now, Mr. President, see what can be done in the United Nations. In this forum, in this arena, we must not for a moment let down our attack on aggressors. However much the peoples of some misinformed or uninformed or timid nations may accept the belief that we are the aggressors, those who sit in the Council and the Assembly of the United Nations know that this is not so. They know that North Korea was the unprovoked aggressor on June 25, 1950. They know that that aggression was followed up by a massive aggression on the part of Communist China. They know that these aggressions were organized by the Soviet Government. We must never for a moment allow them to forget that we know this, that they know it, and that we know that they know it.

At the same time, Mr. President, we must continuously display the shining side of this dark shield. The United Nations has peacetime possibilities which we should be earnestly working to develop and which we hope will in time prevail. Some of these peacetime possibilities relate to the very questions which are at issue in the world-wide conflict which the Soviet Government has reinitiated. One of them is access to oil.

It is true that Russia lacks a supply of oil adequate to the size of its population and its requirements for industrial growth. It is true that there are within easy reach of its borders such abundant supplies of this precious substance as are found in Saudi Arabia, in Iran, and in Iraq. It is true that we will endeavor to cut them off from these supplies. But it is also true that should a Russian Government join the peace-loving nations, it will be possible to work out arrangements whereby commercial access to these supplies is available to the people of Russia on the same terms that it is available to the peoples of Western Europe and America. We must be tireless in presenting these possibilities. We must make it seem foolish to other nations that any nation would fight for opportunities which could be granted freely in a free world.

Another of the ancient grievances of the Russian people has been the fact that they have been completely hemmed in on their whole perimeter from access to the sea by ice on the north and by the narrow seas on the east, west, and south, which were and are in the hands of nations which seek to prevent Russian control of these valuable passages.

Here again, should we not enunciate the principle that in a peaceful world and in a United Nations made up of nations who are truly peace loving, it should be possible to solve this age-old problem? It should be possible to put the Dardanelles, the narrow passages of Scandanavia, Gibraltar, the Suez Canal, and even the Panama Canal under the protection and control of a United Nations force and a United Nations administration, so that all the nations of the world had equality and freedom of access. Of course this could be done only with a United Nations made up of peace-loving nations. It is another shining hope to be held out through good times and bad, through sun and cloud, by ourselves and other peace-loving members of that organization.

There must also be held out the possibility of disarmament. This would mean disarmament not merely in atomic or hydrogen bombs, but in all the categories of heavy armament and high-powered explosives. It is necessarily only that the nations agree to do this and willingly submit to inspection and control by United Nations officials. To refuse such inspection and control is plainly to indicate to the rest of the world that things are going on which one does not wish the rest of the world to see. Our Nation and the other nations of the western world can open themselves freely, frankly, and fully on this matter. The same freedom, frankness, and fullness of inspection and control on the part of Russia can free her people from any fear of destruction and sudden death by military action from the skies above, the land beneath, or the waters which surround the earth. Peace is here for the asking and for the responsible acceptance of it. This must be said over and over and over.

This offer of peace involves the establishment of United Nations forces and of a freedom of communication which is one of the essentials of freedom in life and institutions. To attain this freedom of communication and freedom from fear is, after all, a simple thing to do. We must always be ready to discuss it and to negotiate for it. The United Nations must be an institution of doors open at all times and under all circumstances for the discussion of the means for attaining peaceful relations between its members.

Along with this must go a continued and intense campaign, world-wide, for getting people in communication with people. Such communication, honestly established, would reveal to each nation that there are no people of its sister nations who desire to make war upon it, who desire to seize territory or natural wealth which properly belongs to it. The great desire in the hearts of all men is to do away with war and fighting. If men can get in contact with men, the forces which drive us toward war will be weakened and diminished.

We need a great movement among the peoples not for peace alone, for real peace cannot exist in the presence of slavery and injustice; we need a movement of all the peoples of the earth for a peace which is based on freedom and justice.

To say all this is not to deal in abstractions. The Russians were not dealing in abstractions when they sold Communist ideals to the people of China. They had ideas to sell and they sold them. It mattered not that they had never practiced those ideals themselves. It mattered not that in the countries which they rule those ideals were betrayed. Ideals were set up which were attractive to the people, and the people followed them as the children followed the Pied Piper of Hamelin into the cave of oblivion.

We have something more powerful to sell. We have to sell a real appreciation of and reliance upon the brotherhood of man under the fatherland of God. If we can display the spirit of this doctrine in practice, if we can keep it in the forefront of our thoughts and actions, we will find the ultimate in the "economy of means." That ultimate is the continuous preaching and practice not of the "big lie" but of the great truth.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to commend the distinguished Senator from Vermont for his very able presentation. I listened to a portion of his address, and I have read the rest of it. I congratulate him on his commonsense approach, and on the idealism and spiritual faith with which he speaks.

PRICING PRACTICES

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on Monday, January 8, the Supreme Court handed down its decision in the case of the Standard Oil Co. versus the Federal Trade Commission. The Court divided five to three, with Mr. Justice Minton taking no part in the consideration or decision of the case, in view of the fact that he had written the opinion in the court below, when he was a judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

Mr. Justice Reed wrote the dissent for the three-judge minority, being joined by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Black.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Burton.

This decision is a matter of interest, I am sure, to many of my colleagues, particularly those who participated in the so-called basing-point pricing controversy.

Actually, of course, the point at issue was not basing-point pricing at all; the real question was whether it was lawful to sell at a reduced price to a particular buyer in order to meet in good faith the legal price of a competitor.

The Supreme Court has decided that it is lawful.

Also involved, of course, was the question of whether a seller might quote and sell at delivered prices or absorb freight, acting independently and in good faith, for the purpose of meeting competition.

This is the decision of the Supreme Court which we were told Congress must await before it could take any action to clarify the confusion and uncertainty existing with respect to the interpretation of section 2 (b) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act.

We were told that if Congress acted in the way proposed we should be coercing the Supreme Court.

Congress did act; and the President vetoed the bill. Now we have a decision of the Supreme Court which follows the view taken by those of us who supported the bill which Congress passed.

But, Mr. President, the fact that the Court divided five to three, and that the Justice who did not participate would undoubtedly have joined the minority if he had participated, making the decision five to four in that instance, is the most convincing evidence possible, if any evidence is needed, that there is still confusion and uncertainty and difference of opinion with respect to the proper interpretation of section 2 (b) of the Clayton Act.

I repeat, therefore, Mr. President, what I said on this floor more than a year ago: The record is so clear with regard to this confusion that I cannot see how there can be any doubt of the obligation of the Congress to speak on this question.

If Congress acts now to affirm and by statute confirm this decision of the Supreme Court, then uncertainty will be ended and there need be no fear that a change of one Justice, or a change in the mind of one Justice, might change the law. I earnestly hope, therefore, that Congress will, at this session, again grapple with this question, and again take appropriate action with the hope that this time the action which the Congress takes will not be nullified by a veto.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to discuss in any great detail the opinion of the court in the Standard Oil case; but, since I am referring to it at all, I believe it is only right I should express here my opinion that this is a well-seasoned decision, a well-written decision, a sound and salutary decision from all standpoints. We would expect no less from our former colleague, Mr. Justice Burton. We learned while he was yet among us, to have the highest regard for the clarity of his mind and the depth of his legal knowledge; and his record on the Supreme Court bench has added new luster to his reputation.

I have said I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to discuss this decision in great detail; but if I may be permitted just a few moments more, there are one or two comments which I feel should be made.

The whole effect of the Court's decision is summed up by Mr. Justice Burton in one paragraph, which is so cogent that I wish to read it.

Speaking of subsection 2 (b) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, the Court says:

> The defense in subsection (b), now before us, is limited to a price reduction made to meet in good faith an equally low price of a competitor. It thus eliminates certain difficulties which arose under the original Clayton Act. For example, it omits reference to discriminations in price in the same or different communities * * * and it thus restricts the proviso to price differentials occurring in actual competition. It also excludes reductions which undercut the lower price of a competitor. None of these changes, however, cut into the actual core of the defense. That still consists of the provision that wherever a lawful lower price of a competitor threatens to deprive a seller of a customer, the seller, to retain that customer, may in good faith meet that lower price. Actual competition, at least in this elemental form, is thus preserved.

I was extremely glad that the Court pointed out that in both the Corn Products case and the Staley case the right of a seller, under section 2 (b) of the Clayton Act, as amended, to meet in good faith an equally low price of a competitor, was considered.

As the Court said:

> While this Court did not sustain the seller's defense in either case, it did unquestionably recognize the relevance of the evidence in support of that defense. The decision in each case was based upon the insufficiency of the seller's evidence to establish its defense, not upon the inadequacy of its defense as a matter of law.

That statement should dispose of a great deal of loose thinking and general foolishness with regard to the decisions in question, such as found considerable currency hereabout during the first half of 1950, and which even crept, all too often, into debate on the floor of the Senate.

This decision of the Court, and the minority opinion, serve to bring very sharply into focus the basic policy question which was at the heart of all the controversy over the so-called basing-point pricing legislation. The Court—that is, the majority of the Court, in the decision delivered by Mr. Justice Burton—takes the same position taken by those of us who supported the bill S. 1008 in the Eightieth Congress, and phrases that position, I think, more clearly perhaps than any of us did here on the Senate floor. The Court says:

> It is enough to say that Congress did not seek by the Robinson-Patman Act either to abolish competition or so radically to curtail it that a seller would have no substantial right of self-defense against a price raid by a competitor * * * There is, on the other hand, plain language and established practice which permits a seller, through section 2 (b), to retain a customer by realistically meeting in good faith the price offered to that customer, without necessarily changing the seller's price to its other customers.
> In a case where a seller sustains the burden of proof placed upon it to establish its defense under section 2 (b), we find no reason to destroy that defense indirectly, merely because it also appears that the beneficiaries of the seller's price reductions may derive a competitive advantage from them or may, in a natural course of events, reduce their own resale prices to their customers.

The opposite view is clearly stated in Mr. Justice Reed's dissent, as follows:

> We believe that good faith meeting of a competitor's price only rebuts the prima facie case of violation established by showing the price discrimination. Whether the proven price discrimination is of a character that violates section 2 (a) then becomes a matter for the determination of the commission on a showing that there may be injury to competition.

Borrowing once more from the language of the court, in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Burton, we see that the defense contained in the proviso in section 2 (b), if so interpreted, "Would not be available when there was or might be an injury to competition at a resale level. So interpreted, the proviso would have such little, if any, applicability as to be practically meaningless."

That is the controversy which, unless the Congress acts to settle it once and for all, will remain in doubt, probably for many years, and, at least, so long as there is a possibility that what is presently the minority of the Court may become the majority through the change in mind or in person of a single Justice.

Mr. President, I ask that the complete text of the decision to which I have referred, together with the minority opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Reed, may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the majority and dissenting opinions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 1, OCTOBER TERM, 1950—STANDARD OIL CO., PETITIONER, VERSUS FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION—ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

(January 8, 1951)

Mr. Justice Burton delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this case the Federal Trade Commission challenged the right of the Standard Oil Co., under the Robinson-Patman Act,[1] to sell gasoline to four comparatively large jobber customers in Detroit at a less price per gallon than it sold like gasoline to many comparatively small service-station customers in the same area. The company's defenses were that (1) the sales involved were not in interstate commerce and (2) its lower price to the jobbers was justified because they were made to retain them as customers and in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor.[2] The Commission, with one member dissenting, ordered the company to cease and desist from making such a price differential (43 FTC 56). The court of appeals slightly modified the order and required its enforcement as modified (178 F. 2d 210). We granted certiorari on petition of the company because the case presents an important issue under the Robinson-Patman Act, which has not been settled by this Court (338 U. S. 865). The case was argued at our October term, 1949, and reargued at this term (339 U. S. 975).

For the reasons hereinafter stated, we agree with the court below that the sales were made in interstate commerce but we agree with petitioner that, under the act, the lower price to the jobbers was justified if it was made to retain each of them as a customer and in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor.

I. FACTS

Reserving for separate consideration the facts determining the issue of interstate commerce, the other material facts are summarized here on the basis of the Commission's findings. The sales described are those of Red Crown gasoline because those sales raise all of the material issues and constitute about 90 percent of petitioner's sales in the Detroit area.

Since the effective date of the Robinson-Patman Act, June 19, 1936, petitioner has sold its Red Crown gasoline to its jobber customers at its tank-car prices. Those prices have been 1½ cents per gallon less than its tank-wagon prices to service station customers for identical gasoline in the same area. In practice, the service stations have resold the gasoline at the pervailing retail service station prices.[3] Each of petitioner's so-called jobber customers has been free to resell its gasoline at retail or wholesale. Each, at some time, has resold some of it at retail. One now resells it only at retail. The others now resell it largely at wholesale As to resale prices, two of the jobbers have resold their gasoline only at the prevailing wholesale or retail rates. The other two, however, have reflected, in varying degrees, petitioner's reductions in the cost of the gasoline to them by reducing their resale prices of that gasoline below the prevailing rates.

The effect of these reductions has thus reached competing retail service stations in part through retail stations operated by the jobbers and in part through retail stations which purchased gasoline from the jobbers at less than the prevailing tank-wagon prices. The Commission found that such reduced resale prices have resulted in injuring, destroying, and preventing competition between said favored dealers and retail dealers in respondent's (petitioner's) gasoline and other major brands of gasoline" (41 FTC 263, 283). The distinctive characteristics of these jobbers are that each (1) maintains sufficient bulk storage to take delivery of gasoline in tank-car quantities (of 8,000 to 12,000 gallons) rather than in tank-wagon quantities (of 700 to 800 gallons) as is customary for service stations; (2) owns and operates tank wagons and other facilities for delivery of gasoline to service stations; (3) has an established business sufficient to in-

[1] Specifically under sec. 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C., sec. 13). For the material text of sec. 2 (a) and (b) see pp. 9–10, infra.

[2] The company contended before the Commission that the price differential allowed by it to the jobbers made only due allowance for differences in the cost of sale and delivery of gasoline to them. It did not, however, pursue this defense in the court below and does not do so here.

[3] About 150 of these stations are owned or leased by the customer independently of petitioner. Their operators buy all of their gasoline from petitioner under short-term agreements. Its other 208 stations are leased or subleased from petitioner for short terms.

sure purchases of from one to two million gallons a year; and (4) has adequate credit responsibility.[4] While the cost of petitioner's sales and deliveries of gasoline to each of these four jobbers is no doubt less, per gallon, than the cost of its sales and deliveries of like gasoline to its service station customers in the same area, there is no finding that such difference accounts for the entire reduction in price made by petitioner to these jobbers, and we proceed on the assumption that it does not entirely account for that difference.

Petitioner placed its reliance upon evidence offered to show that its lower price to each jobber was made in order to retain that jobber as a customer and in good faith to meet an equally low price offered by one or more competitors. The Commission, however, treated such evidence as not relevant.

II. THE SALES WERE MADE IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

In order for the sales here involved to come under the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, they must have been made in interstate commerce.[5] The Commission and the court below agree that the sales were so made. (41 F. T. C. 263, 271, 173 F. 2d 210, 213–214.)

Facts determining this were found by the Commission as follows: Petitioner is an Indiana corporation, whose principal office is in Chicago. Its gasoline is obtained from fields in Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wyoming. Its refining plant is at Whiting, Ind. It distributes its products in 14 middle western States, including Michigan. The gasoline sold by it in the Detroit, Mich., area, and involved in this case, is carried for petitioner by tankers on the Great Lakes from Indiana to petitioner's marine terminal at River Rouge, Mich. Enough gasoline is accumulated there during each navigation season so that a winter's supply is available from the terminal. The gasoline remains for varying periods at the terminal or in nearby bulk storage stations, and while there it is under the ownership of petitioner and en route from petit oner's refinery in Indiana to its market in Michigan. "Although the gasoline was not brought to River Rouge pursuant to orders already taken, the demands of the Michigan territory are fairly constant, and petitioner's customers' demands could be accurately estimated, so the flow of the stream of commerce kept surging from Whiting to Detroit" (173 F. 2d at 213–214). Gasoline delivered to customers in Detroit, upon individual orders for it, is taken from the gasoline at the terminal in interstate commerce en route for delivery in that area. Such sales are well within the jurisdictional requirements of the act. Any other conclusion would fall short of the recognized purpose of the Robinson-Patman Act to reach the operations of large interstate businesses in competition with small local concerns. Such temporary storage of the gasoline as occurs within the Detroit area does not deprive the gasoline of its interstate character (Stafford v. Wallace (258 U. S. 495). Compare Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co. (317 U. S. 564 570), with Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. (275 U. S. 257, 268)).[6]

III. THERE SHOULD BE A FINDING AS TO WHETHER OR NOT PETITIONER'S PRICE REDUCTION WAS MADE IN GOOD FAITH TO MEET A LAWFUL, EQUALLY LOW PRICE OF A COMPETITOR

Petitioner presented evidence tending to prove that its tank-car price was made to each jobber in order to retain that jobber as a customer and in good faith to meet a lawful and equally low price of a competitor. Petitioner sought to show that it succeeded in retaining these customers, although the tank-car price which it offered them merely approached or matched, and did not undercut, the lower prices offered them by several competitors of petitioner. The trial examiner made findings on the point,[7] but the Commission declined to do so, saying:

"Based on the record in this case the Commission concludes as a matter of law that it is not material whether the discriminations in price granted by the respondent to the said four dealers were made to meet equally low prices of competitors. The Commission further concludes as a matter of law that it is unnecessary for the Commission to determine whether the alleged competitive prices were in fact available or involved gasoline of like grade or quality or of equal public acceptance. Accordingly the Commission does not attempt to find the facts regarding those matters because, even though the lower prices in question may have been made by respondent in good faith to meet the lower prices of competitors, this does not constitute a defense in the face of affirmative proof that the effect of the discrimination was to injure, destroy, and prevent competition with the retail stations operated by the said named dealers and with stations operated by their retailer-customers" (41 FTC 263, 281–282).

The court below affirmed the Commission's position.[8]

There is no doubt that under the Clayton Act, before its amendment by the Robinson-Patman Act, this evidence would have been material and, if accepted, would have established a complete defense to the charge of unlawful discrimination. At that time the material provisions of section 2 were as follows:

"SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to cr...te a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade" (38 Stat. 730–731, 15 U. S. C. (1934 ed.), sec. 13).

The question before us, therefore, is whether the amendments made by the Robinson-Patman Act deprived those facts of their previously recognized effectiveness as a defense. The material provisions of section 2, as amended, are quoted below, showing in brackets those clauses which bear upon the proviso before us. The modified provisions are distributed between the newly created subsections (a) and (b). These must be read together and in relation to the provisions they supersede. The original phrase "that nothing herein contained shall prevent" is still used to introduce each of the defenses. The defense relating to the meeting of the price of a competitor appears only in subsection (b). There it is applied to discriminations in services or facilities as well as to discriminations in price, which alone are expressly condemned in subsection (a). In its opinion in the instant case, the Commission recognizes that it is an absolute defense to a charge of price discrimination for a seller to prove, under section 2 (a), that its price differential makes only due allowances for differences in cost or for price changes made in response to changing market conditions (41 F. T. C. at 283). Each of these three defenses is introduced by the same phrase "nothing * * * shall prevent," and all are embraced in the same word "justification" in the first sentence of section 2 (b). It is natural, therefore, to conclude that each of these defenses is entitled to the same effect, without regard to whether there also appears an affirmative showing of actual or potential injury to competition at the same or a lower level traceable to the [4] Not denying the established industry practice of recognizing such dealers as a distinctive group for operational convenience, the Commission held that petitioner's classification of these four dealers as jobbers was arbitrary because it made no requirement that said jobbers should sell only at wholesale" (41 FTC at 273). We use the term "jobber" in this opinion merely as one of convenience and identification, because the result here is the same whether these four dealers are wholesalers or retailers.

[5] Sec. 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, as amended, relates only to persons "engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce * * * where either or any of the purchases involved * * * are in commerce" (49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C., sec. 13 (a)). "Commerce" is defined in sec. 1 of the Clayton Act as including "trade or commerce among the several states" (38 Stat. 730, 15 U. S. C., sec. 12).

[6] The Fair Labor Standards Act cases relied on by petitioner are not inconsistent with this result. They hold that, for the purposes of that statute, interstate commerce ceased on delivery to a local distributor (Higgins v. Carr Bros. (317 U. S. 572); Walling v. Jacksonville Paper Co., supra. The sales involved here, on the other hand, are those of an interstate producer and refiner to a local distributor.

[7] The trial examiner concluded: "The recognition by respondent [petitioner] of Ned's Auto Supply Co. as a jobber or wholesaler [which carried with it the tank-car price for gasoline] was a forced recognition given to retain that company's business. Ned's Co. at the time of recognition, and ever since, has possessed all qualifications required by respondent [petitioner] for recognition as a jobber and the recognition was given and has ever since been continued in transactions between the parties, believed by them to be bona fide in all respects." Conclusion of Fact 2, under sec. IX, R. 5098–5099.) "The differentials on its branded gasolines respondent [petitioner] granted Ned's Auto Supply Co., at all times subsequent to March 7, 1936, and Stikeman Oil Co., Citrin-Kolb Oil Co., and the Wayne Co. [the four jobbers], at all times subsequent to June 19, 1936, were granted to meet equally low prices offered by competitors on branded gasolines of comparable grade and quality." (Conclusion of fact, under sec. X, R. 5104.)

[8] "Now as to the contention that the discriminatory prices here complained of were made in good faith to meet a lower price of a competitor. While the Commission made no finding on this point, it assumed its existence but held, contrary to the petitioner's contention, that this was not a defense. * * * We agree with the Commission that the showing of the petitioner that it made the discriminatory price in good faith to meet competition is not controlling in view of the very substantial evidence that its discrimination was used to affect and lessen competition at the retail level" (173 F. (2d) at 214, 217).

price differential made by the seller. The Commission says, however, that the proviso in section 2 (b) as to a seller meeting in good faith a lower competitive price is not an absolute defense if an injury to competition may result from such price reduction. We find no basis for such a distinction between the defenses in sections 2 (a) and (b).

The defense in subsection (b), now before us, is limited to a price reduction made to meet in good faith an equally low price of a competitor. It thus eliminates certain difficulties which arose under the original Clayton Act. For example, it omits reference to discriminations in price "in the same or different communities * * *" and it thus restricts the proviso to price differentials occurring in actual competition. It also excludes reductions which undercut the lower price of a competitor. None of these changes, however, cut into the actual core of the defense. That still consists of the provision that wherever a lawful lower price of a competitor threatens to deprive a seller of a customer, the seller, to retain that customer, may in good faith meet that lower price. Actual competition, at least in this elemental form, is thus preserved.

Subsections 2 (a) and (b), as amended, are as follows:

"SEC. 2. (a) That is shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them: Provided, [That nothing herein contained shall prevent] differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered: * * * And provided further, [That nothing herein containe i shall prevent] price changes from time to time * * * in response to changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned. * * *

"(b) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, [the burden of rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing justification] shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and [unless justification shall be affirmatively shown,] the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, [That nothing herein contained shall prevent] a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by [showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor]" (49 Stat. 1526, 15 U. S. C., secs. 13 (a) and (b)).

This right of a seller, under section 2 (b), to meet in good faith an equally low price of a competitor has been considered here before. Both in Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (324 U. S. 726) and in Federal Trade Commission v. Staley Manufacturing Co. (324 U. S. 746) evidence in support of this defense was reviewed at length. There would have been no occasion thus to review it under the theory now contended for by the Commission. While this court did not sustain the seller's defense in either case, it did unquestionably recognize the relevance of the evidence in support of that defense. The decision in each case was based upon the insufficiency of the seller's evidence to establish its defense, not upon the inadequacy of its defense as a matter of law.[9]

In the Corn Products case, supra, after recognizing that the seller had allowed differentials in price in favor of certain customers, this court examined the evidence presented by the seller to show that such differentials were justified because made in good faith to meet equally low prices of a competitor. It then said:

"Examination of the testimony satisfies us, as it did the court below, that it was insufficient to sustain a finding that the lower prices allowed to favored customers were in fact made to meet competition. Hence petitioners failed to sustained the burden of showing that the price discriminations were granted for the purpose of meeting competition" (324 U. S. at 741).[10]

In the Staley case, supra, most of the Court's opinion is devoted to the consideration of the evidence introduced in support of the seller's defense under section 2 (b). The discussion proceeds upon the assumption, applicable here, that if a competitor's lower price is a lawful individual price offered to any of the seller's customers, then the seller is protected, under section 2 (b), in making a counteroffer, provided the seller proves that its counteroffer is made to meet in good faith its competitor's equally low price. On the record in the Staley case, a majority of the court of appeals, in fact, declined to accept the findings of the Commission and decided in favor of the accused seller.[11] This court, on review, reversed that judgment but emphatically recognized the availability of the seller's defense under section 2 (b) and the obligation of the Commission to make findings upon issues material to that defense. It said:

"Congress has left to the Commission the determination of fact in each case whether the person, charged with making discriminatory prices, acted in good faith to meet a competitor's equally low prices. The determination of this fact from the evidence is for the Commission. (See Federal Trade Commission v. Pacific States Paper Trade Assn. (273 U. S. 52, 63); Federal Trade Commission v. Algoma Lumber Co. (291 U. S. 67, 73).) In the present case, the Commission's finding that respondents' price discriminations were not made to meet a lower price and consequently were not in good faith, is amply supported by the record, and we think the court of appeals erred in setting aside this portion of the Commission's order to cease and desist.

"In appraising the evidence, the Commission recognized that the statute does not place an impossible burden upon sellers, but it emphasized the good faith requirement of the statute, which places the burden of proving good faith on the seller, who has made the discriminatory prices. * * *

"We agree with the Commission that the statute at least requires the seller, who has knowingly discriminated in price, to show the existence of facts which would lead a reasonable and prudent person to believe that the granting of a lower price would in fact meet the equally low price of a competitor. Nor was the Commission wrong in holding that respondents failed to meet this burden" (324 U. S. at 758, 759–760).

See also, Federal Trade Comm'n v. Cement Institute (333 U. S. 683, 721–726); Federal Trade Comm'n v. Morton Salt Co. (334 U. S. 37, 43); and United States v. United States Gypsum Co. (340 U. S. 76, 92). All that petitioner asks in the instant case is that its evidence be considered and that findings be made by the Commission as to the sufficiency of that evidence to support petitioner's defense under section 2 (b).

In addition, there has been widespread understanding that under the Robinson-Patman Act, it is a complete defense to a charge of price discrimination for the seller to show that its price differential has been made a good faith to meet a lawful and equally low price of a competitor. This understanding is reflected in actions and statements of members and counsel of the Federal Trade Commission.[12] Representa-

[9] In contrast to that factual situation, the trial examiner for the Commission in the instant case has found the necessary facts to sustain the seller's defense (see note 7, supra), and yet the Commission refuses, as a matter of law, to give them consideration.

[10] In the Corn Products case, the same point of view was expressed by the court of appeals below: "We think the evidence is insufficient to sustain this affirmative defense" (144 F. 2d 211, 217 (C. A. 7th Cir.)). The court of appeals also indicated that, to sustain this defense, it must appear not only that the competitor's lower price was met in good faith but that such price was lawful.

[11] The Staley case was twice before the court of appeals for the seventh circuit. In 1943 the case was remanded by that court to the Commission for findings as to wherein the discriminations occurred and how they substantially lessened competition and promoted monopoly and also "for consideration of the defense [under sec. 2 (b)] urged by the petitioners, and for findings in relation thereto" (135 F. 2d 453, 456). In 1944, a majority of the court decided in favor of the seller (144 F. 2d 221). One judge held that the complaint was insufficient under sec. 2 (a) and that, therefore, he need not reach the seller's defense under sec. 2 (b). He expressly stated, however, that he did not take issue with the basis for the conclusion that the seller's price was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor (Id., at 227–231). His colleague held squarely that the seller's defense of meeting competition in good faith under section 2 (b) had been established (Id., at 221–225). The third judge found against the seller both under sec. 2 (a) and (b) (Id., at 225–227). The important point for us is that the court of appeals, as well as this court, unanimously recognized in that case the materiality of the seller's evidence in support of its defense under sec. 2 (b), even though the "discriminations 'have resulted, and do result, in substantial injury to competition among purchasers'" (Id., at 222).

[12] In cease-and-desist orders, issued both before and after the order in the instant case, the Commission has inserted saving clauses which recognize the propriety of a seller making a price reduction in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, even though the seller's discrimination may have the effect of injuring competition at a lower level. (See In re Ferro-Enamel Corp. (42 F. T. C. 36); In re Anheuser-Busch, Inc. (31 F. T. C. 986); In re Bausch & Lomb Optical Co. (28 F. T. C. 186).) See also, the statement filed by Walter B. Wooden, Assistant Chief Counsel, and by Hugh E. White, examiner for the Commission, with the Temporary National Economic Committee in 1941: "The amended act now safeguards the right of a seller to discriminate in price in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, but he has the burden of proof on that question. This right is guaranteed by statute and could not be curtailed by any mandate or order of the Commission * * * The right of self-defense against competitive price attack is as vital in a competitive economy as the right of self-defense against personal attack." The Basing Point Problem 139 (TNEC Monograph 42, 1941). In regard to the Commission's position on sec. 2 (b), urged in the instant case, Allen C. Phelps, assistant chief trial counsel and Chief of the Export Trade Division of the Commission, testified before the Subcommittee on Trade Policies of the Sentives of the Department of Justice have testified to the effectiveness and value of the defense under the Robinson-Patman Act.[13] We see no reason to depart now from that interpretation.[14] ate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in June 1949, that "This position, if upheld in the courts, in my judgment will effectively and completely erase sec. 2 (b) from the Robinson-Patman Act." Hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on S. 236, 81st Cong., 1st sess., 66 (see also, pp. 274–275).

[13] Herbert A. Bergson, then Assistant Attorney General, testifying for the Department, January 25, 1949, said: "The section [2 (b)] presently permits sellers to justify otherwise forbidden price discriminations on the ground that the lower prices to one set of buyers were made in good faith to meet the equally low prices of a competitor. Hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on S. 236, 81st Cong., 1st sess., 77. (See also, report on S. 236 by Peyton Ford, Assistant to the Attorney General, to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (Id., at 320).) Mr. Bergson added the following in June 1949: "While we recognize the competitive problem which arises when one purchaser obtains advantages denied to other purchasers, we do not believe the solution to this problem lies in denying to sellers the opportunity to make sales in good faith competition with other sellers." Hearings before Subcommittee No. 1 of the House Committee on the Judiciary on S. 1008, 81st Cong., 1st sess., 12.

[14] Attention has been directed again to the legislative history of the proviso. This was considered in the Corn Products and Staley cases. (See especially, 324 U. S. at 722–753.) We find that the legislative history, at best, is inconclusive. It indicates that it was the purpose of Congress to limit, but not to abolish, the essence of the defense recognized as absolute in sec. 2 of the original Clayton Act (38 Stat. 730) where a seller's reduction in price had been made "in good faith to meet competition." For example, the legislative history recognizes that the Robinson-Patman Act limits that defense to price differentials that do not undercut the competitor's price, and the amendments fail to protect differentials between prices in different communities where those prices are not actually competitive. There is also a suggestion in the debates, as well as in the remarks of this Court in the Staley case, supra, that a competitor's lower price, which may be met by a seller under the protection of sec. 2 (b), must be a lawful price. And see, S. Res. 224, 70th Cong., 1st sess., directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report to it on chain-store operators and FTC final report on the chain-store investigation (S. Doc. No. 4, 74th Cong., 1st sess.). In the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, which drafted the clause which became sec. 2 (b), there appears the following explanation of it: "This proviso represents a contraction of an exemption now contained in section 2 of the Clayton Act which permits discriminations without limit where made in good faith to meet competition. It should be noted that while the seller is permitted to meet local competition, it does not permit him to cut local prices until his competitor has first offered lower prices, and then he can go no further than to meet those prices. If he goes further, he must do so likewise with all his other customers, or make himself liable to all of the penalties of the act, including treble damages. In other words, the proviso permits the seller to meet the price actually previously offered by a local competitor. It permits him to go no further." H. Rept. No. 2287, 74th Cong., 2d sess., 16.

The heart of our national economic policy long has been faith in the value of competition. In the Sherman and Clayton Acts, as well as in the Robinson-Patman Act, "Congress was dealing with competition, which it sought to protect, and monopoly, which it sought to prevent" (Staley Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n (135 F. 2d 453, 455)). We need not now reconcile, in its entirety, the economic theory which underlies the Robinson-Patman Act with that of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.[15] It is enough to say that Congress did not seek by the Robinson-Patman Act either to abolish competition or so radically to curtail it that a seller would have no substantial right of self-defense against a price raid by a competitor. For example, if a large customer requests his seller to meet a temptingly lower price offered to him by one of his seller's competitors, the seller may well find it essential, as a matter of business survival, to meet that price rather than to lose the customer. It might be that this customer is the seller's only available market for the major portion of the seller's product, and that the loss of this customer would result in forcing a much higher unit cost and higher sales price upon the seller's other customers. There is nothing to show a congressional purpose, in such a situation, to compel the seller to choose only between ruinously cutting its prices to all its customers to match the price offered to one, or refusing to meet the competition and then ruinously raising its prices to its remaining customers to cover increased unit costs. There is, on the other hand, plain language and established practice which permits a seller, through section 2 (b), to retain a customer by realistically meeting in good faith the price offered to that customer, without necessarily changing the seller's price to its other customers.

In a case where a seller sustains the burden of proof placed upon it to establish its defense under section 2 (b), we find no reason to destroy that defense indirectly, merely because it also appears that the beneficiaries of the seller's price reductions may derive a competitive advantage from them or may, in a natural course of events, re-

(See also, 80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6426, 6431–6436, 8229, 8235.) Somewhat changing this emphasis, there was a statement made by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, accompanying the conference report, which said that the new clause was a "provision relating to the question of meeting competition, intended to operate only as a rule of evidence in a proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission" (H. Rept. No. 2951, 74th Cong., 2d sess., 7). The chairman of the House conferees also received permission to print in the RECORD an explanation of the proviso (80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 9418). This explanation emphasizes the same interpretation as that put on the proviso in the Staley case to the effect that the lower price which lawfully may be met by a seller must be a lawful price. That statement, however, neither justifies disregarding the proviso nor failing to make findings of fact where evidence is offered that the prices met by the seller are lawful prices and that the meeting of them is in good faith.

[15] It has been suggested that, in theory, the Robinson-Patman Act as a whole is inconsistent with the Sherman and Clayton Acts. See Adelman, Effective Competition and the Antitrust Laws (61 Harv. L. Rev. 1289, 1327–1350); Burns, the Anti-Trust Laws and the Regulation of Pric Competition (4 Law & Contemp. Prob. 301); Learned & Isaacs, the Robinson-Patman Law: Some Assumptions and Expectations (15 Harv. Bus. Rev. 137); McAllister, Price Control by Law in the United States: a Survey (4 Law & Contemp. Prob. 273).

duce their own resale prices to their customers. It must have been obvious to Congress that any price reduction to any dealer may always affect competition at that dealer's level as well as at the dealer's resale level, whether or not the reduction to the dealer is discriminatory. Likewise, it must have been obvious to Congress that any price reductions initiated by a seller's competitor would, if not met by the seller, affect competition at the beneficiary's level or among the beneficiary's customers just as much as if those reductions had been met by the seller. The proviso in section 2 (b), as interpreted by the Commission, would not be available when there was or might be an injury to competition at a resale level. So interpreted, the proviso would have such title, if any, applicability as to be practically meaningless. We may, therefore, conclude that Congress meant to permit the natural consequences to follow the seller's action in meeting in good faith a lawful and equally low price of its competitor.

In its argument here, the Commission suggests that there may be some situations in which it might recognize the proviso in section 2 (b) as a complete defense, even though the seller's differential in price did injure competition. In support of this, the Commission indicates that in each case it must weigh the potentially injurious effect of a seller's price reduction upon competition at all lower levels against its beneficial effect in permitting the seller to meet competition at its own level. In the absence of more explicit requirements and more specific standards of comparison than we have here, it is difficult to see how an injury to competition at a level below that of the seller can thus be balanced fairly against a justification for meeting the competition at the seller's level. We hesitate to accept section 2 (b) as establishing such a dubious defense. On the other hand, the proviso is readily understandable as simply continuing in effect a defense which is equally absolute, but more limited in scope than that which existed under section 2 of the original Clayton Act.

The judgment of the court of appeals, accordingly, is reversed and the case is remanded to that court with instructions to remand it to the Federal Trade Commission to make findings in conformity with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Minton took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 1, OCTOBER TERM, 1950—STANDARD OIL COMPANY, PETITIONER, VERSUS FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION—ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

(January 8, 1951)

Mr. Justice Reed, dissenting.

The Federal Trade Commission investigated practices of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana in selling its gasoline in the Detroit area at different prices to competing local distributors, in alleged violation of the Robinson-Patman (antiprice discrimination) Act. Standard's defense is not a denial of that discriminatory practice but a complete justification, said to be allowed by the Robinson-Patman Act, on the ground of trade necessity in order to meet an equally low price in Detroit of other gasoline refiners. On concluding the practice violated Federal prohibitions against discriminatory sale prices, the Commission entered a cease-and-desist order against Standard's sale system. The order was enforced by the court of appeals after a minor modification (43 F. T. C. 56; 173 F. 2d 210).

The need to allow sellers to meet competition in price from other sellers while protecting the competitors of the buyers against the buyers' advantages gained from the price discrimination was a major cause of the enactment of the 1936 Robinson-Patman Act. The Clayton Act of 1914 had failed to solve the problem. The impossibility of drafting fixed words of a statute so as to allow sufficient flexibility to meet the myriad situations of national commerce, we think led Congress in the Robinson-Patman Act to put authority in the Federal Trade Commission to determine when a seller's discriminatory sales price violated the prohibitions of the antimonopoly statute, section 2 (a), 49 Stat. 1526, and when it was justified by a competitor's legal price.[1] The disadvantage to business of this choice was that the seller could not be positive before the Commission acted as to precisely how far he might go in price discrimination to meet and beat his competition. The Commission acted on its interpretation of the act.[2] Believing it important to support the purpose of Congress and the Commission's interpretation of the act, with which we agree, we state our reasons.

The Court first condemns the Commission's position that meeting in good faith a competitor's price merely rebuts the prima facie establishment of discrimination based on forbidden differences in sales price, so as to require an affirmative finding by the Commission that nevertheless there may be enjoinable injury under the Robinson-Patman Act to the favored buyer's competitors. The Court then decides that good faith in meeting competition was an absolute defense for price discrimination, saying:

"On the other hand, the proviso is readily understandable as simply continuing in effect an equally absolute, but more limited defense than that which existed under section 2 of the original Clayton Act."

Such a conclusion seems erroneous. What follows in this dissent demonstrates, we think, that Congress intended so to amend the Clayton Act that the avenue of escape given price discriminators by its meeting competition clause should be narrowed. The Court's interpretation leaves what the seller can do almost as wide open as before (see p. 12 et seq., infra). It seems clear to us that the interpretation put upon the clause of the Robinson-Patman Act by the Court means that no real change has been brought about by the amendment.

The public policy of the United States fosters the free-enterprise system of unfettered competition among producers and distributors of goods as the accepted method to put those goods into the hands of all consumers at the least expense.[3] There are, however, statutory exceptions to such unlimited competition.[4] Nondiscriminatory pricing tends to weaken competition in that a seller, while otherwise maintaining his prices, cannot meet his antagonist's price to get a single order or customer. But Congress obviously concluded that the greater advantage would acrue by fostering equal access to supplies by competing merchants or other purchasers in the course of business.[5]

The first enactment to put limits on discriminatory selling prices was the Clayton Act in 1914 (38 Stat. 730, sec. 2). Section 11 enabled the Commission to use its investigatory and regulatory authority to handle price discrimination. Section 2 provided for the maintenance of competition by protecting the ability of business rivals to obtain commodities on equal terms. The Robinson-Patman Act moved further toward this objective. In the margin appear the applicable words of the Clayton Act followed by those of the Robinson-Patman Act. Phrased summarily for this case, it may be said that the italicized words in the Clayton Act were the source of the difficulties in enforcement that Congress undertook to avoid by the italicized words of the Robinson-Patman Act.[6]

It will be noted that unless the effect is given the Robinson-Patman amendment contended for by the Federal Trade Commission, there is little done to overcome the difficulties arising from the meeting competition clause of the Clayton Act. Formerly "discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition" was allowed as a complete defense.

Now it is "made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor." The Court says:

"It thus eliminates certain difficulties which arose under the original Clayton Act. For example, it omits reference to discriminations in price 'in the same or different communities' and it thus restricts the proviso to price differentials occurring in actual competition. It also excludes reductions which undercut the 'lower price' of a competitor. None of these changes, however, cut into the actual core of the defense. That still consists of the provision that wherever a lawful lower price of a competitor threatens to deprive a seller of a customer, the seller, to retain that customer, may in good faith meet that lower price."

We see little difference. The seller still, under the Court's interpretation, discriminate in sales of goods of like quantity and quality between buyers on opposite corners, so long as one gets a lower delivered-price offer from another seller, no matter where located. The "actual core of the defense" remains intact.

Legislative history: Upon the interpretation of the words and purpose of this last addition by the Robinson-Patman Act to curbs on discrimination in trade, the narrow statutory issues in this case turn. Though narrow, they are important if trade is to have the benefit of careful investigation before regulation, attainable under the Federal Trade Commission Act but so difficult when attempted by prosecutions in courts with the limitations of judicial procedure. As an aid to the interpretation of section 2 (b), we set out applicable parts of its legislative history.

The Clayton Act created a broad exception from control for prices made in good faith to meet competition. This raised problems of which Congress was aware. In reporting on a redrafted version of S. 3154, the Senate's companion bill to the House bill that became the Robinson-Patman Act, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, February 3, 1936, pointed out the weakness of section 2 of the Clayton Act in permitting discrimination to meet competition, and suggested a harsh remedy, the elimination of its italicized proviso in note 6 supra, without the mollifying words of section 2 (b) of the Robinson-Patman Act.[7]

That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce * * * to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition, or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent * * * discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition * * *." Robinston-Patman Act: "SEC. 2. (a) That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, * * * to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them. * * * (b) Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination. Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor."

[7] S. Rept. No. 1502, 74th Cong., 2d sess., p. 4: "The weakness of present section 2 lies principally in the fact that: (1) It places no limit upon differentials permissible on account of differences in quantity; and (2) it permits discriminations to meet competition, and thus tends to substitute the remedies of retaliation for those of law, with destructive consequences to the central object of the bill. Liberty to meet competition which can be met only by price cuts at the expense of customers elsewhere, is in its unmasked effect the liberty to destroy competition by selling locally below cost, a weapon progressively the more destructive in the hands of the more powerful, and most deadly to the competitor of limited resources, whatever his merit and efficiency. While the bill as now reported closes these dangerous loopholes, it leaves the fields of competition free and open to the most efficient, and thus in fact protects them the more securely against inundations of mere power and size. Specific phrases of section 2 (a), as now reported, may be noted as follows: One: '* * * where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce.' Section 2 (a) attaches to competitive relations between a given seller and his several customers, and this clause is designed to extend its scope to discriminations between interstate and intrastate customers, as well as between those purely interstate. Discriminations in excess of sound economic differences involve generally an element of loss, whether only of the necessary minimum of profits or of actual costs, that must be recouped from the business of customers not granted them. When granted by a given seller to his customers in other States, and denied to those within the State, they involve the use of that interstate commerce to the burden and injury of the latter. When granted to those within the State and denied to those beyond, they involve conversely a directly resulting burden upon interstate commerce with the latter. Both are within the proper and well-recognized power of Congress to suppress."

In March the House Committee on the Judiciary made its report on the bill that became the act. Section 2 (b) was then in substantially its present form. The report pointed out the draftsmen's purpose to strengthen the laws against price discrimination, directly or indirectly, through brokerage or other allowances, services, or absorptions of costs.[8] It commented that the subsection that became section 2 (b) let a seller "meet the price actually previously offered by a local competitor."[9]

The language used in regard to competition in the bills and in the act seems to have been based on a recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission.[10] The Commission had been unable to restore the desired competition under the Clayton Act, and Congress evidently sought to open the way for effective action.[11]

Events in the course of the proposed legislation in the Senate and House have pertinence. The Senate inserted the original ineffective language of the Clayton Act in its exact form in the Senate bill. In the same draft it adopted an amendment similar to the proviso ultimately enacted (80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6426, 6435). In the House, Representative PATMAN explained his view of the dangers in the original proviso.[12]

It was taken out in conference.[13] The chairman of the House managers, Mr. Utterback, before the conference report was agreed to by the House, received permission to print an explanation of his understanding of the proviso. He explained that the proviso "does not set up the meeting of competition as an absolute bar to a charge of discrimination under the bill. It merely permits it to be shown in evidence. * * * It leaves it a question of fact to be determined in each case, whether the competition to be met was such as to justify the discrimination given." The pertinent parts of the statement appear in the margin.[14]

[8] H. Rept. No. 2287, 74th Cong., 2d sess., p. 3: "The purpose of this proposed legislation is to restore, so far as possible, equality of opportunity in business by strengthening antitrust laws and by protecting trade and commerce against unfair trade practices and unlawful price discrimination, and also against restraint and monopoly for the better protection of consumers, workers, and independent producers, manufacturers, merchants, and other businessmen. To accomplish its purpose, the bill amends and strengthens the Clayton Act by prohibiting discriminations in price between purchasers where such discriminations cannot be shown to be justified by differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from different methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold and delivered. It also prohibits brokerage allowances except for services actually rendered, and advertising and other service allowances unless such allowances or services are made available to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms. It strikes at the basing-point method of sale, which lessens competition and tends to create a monopoly."

[9] Id., p. 16: "This proviso represents a contraction of an exemption now contained in section 2 of the Clayton Act which permits discriminations without limit where made in good faith to meet competition. It should be noted that while the seller is permitted to meet local competition it does not permit him to cut local prices until his competitor has first offered lower prices, and then he can go no further than to meet those prices. If he goes further he must do so likewise with all his other customers, or make himself liable to all of the penalties of the act, including treble damages. In other words, the proviso permits the seller to meet the price actually previously offered by a local competitor. It permits him to go no further."

[10] Final Report on the Chain-Store Investigation, S. Doc. No. 4, 74th Cong., 1st sess., p. 96: "A simple solution for the uncertainties and difficulties of enforcement would be to prohibit unfair and unjust discrimination in price and leave it to the enforcement agency, subject to review by the courts, to apply that principle to particular cases and situations. The soundness of and extent to which the present provisos would constitute valid defenses would thus become a judicial and not a legislative matter. The Commission therefore recommends that section 2 of the Clayton Act be amended to read as follows: 'It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in any transaction in or affecting such commerce, either directly or indirectly to discriminate unfairly or unjustly in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States.'" This report was utilized by the House committee dealing with the proposed Robinson-Patman legislation. H. Rept. No. 2287, 74th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 3, 7.

[11] Id., p. 64: "If the discrimination is 'on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold,' or makes 'only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation,' or is 'made in good faith to meet competition,' it is not unlawful, even though the effect 'may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.' Discriminatory price concessions given to prevent the loss of a chain-store's business to a competing manufacturer, to prevent it manufacturing its own goods, or to prevent it from discouraging in its stores the sale of a given manufacturer's goods, may be strongly urged by the manufacturer as 'made in good faith to meet competition'" (see p. 90, id.). Attention was called to this need. H. Rept. No. 2287, 74th Cong., 2d sess., p. 7: "Some of the difficulties of enforcement of this section as it stands are pointed out in the [final report] of the Federal Trade Commission above referred to, at pages 63 and following."

[12] 80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 8235: "Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. A great many of the industries in Ohio were very much in favor of the proviso in the Senate bill, appearing on page 4, and reading as follows: 'And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price in the same or different commodities made in good faith to meet competition.' I find that on page 9 of the Patman bill, beginning in line 14, there appear these words: 'Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing that his lower price to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor.' Will the gentleman explain the difference between these two proposals?

"Mr. PATMAN. If the Senate amendment should be adopted it would really destroy the bill. It would permit the corporate chains to go into a local market, cut the price down so low that it would destroy local competitors and make up for their losses in other places where they had already destroyed their competitors. One of the objects of the bill is to get around that phrase and prevent the large corporate chains from selling below cost in certain localities, thus destroying the independent merchants, and making it up at other places where their competitors have already been destroyed. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the Senate amendment, because it would be very destructive of the bill. The phrase 'equally low price' means the corporate chain will have the right to compete with the local merchants. They may meet competition, which is all right, but they cannot cut down the price below cost for the purpose of destroying the local man.

"Mr. COOPER of Ohio. What does the gentleman's proviso mean?

"Mr. PATMAN. It means they may meet competition, but not cut down the price below cost. It means an equally low price but not below that. It permits competition, but it does not permit them to cut the price below cost in order to destroy their competitors. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the Senate amendment." (But see pp. 15 and 16, infra).

[13] H. Rept. No. 2951, 74th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 6–7: "The Senate bill contained a further proviso 'That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition.' This language is found in existing law, and in the opinion of the conferees is one of the obstacles to enforcement of the present Clayton Act. The Senate receded, and the language is stricken. A provision relating to the question of meeting competition, intended to operate only as a rule of evidence in a proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission, is included in subsection (b) in the conference text as follows: 'Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilites furnished by a competitor.'"

[14] 80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 9418: "In connection with the above rule as to burden of proof, it is also provided that a seller may show that his lower price was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or that his furnishing of services or facilities was made in good faith to meet those furnished by a competitor. It is to be noted, however, that this does not set up the meeting of competition as an absolute bar to a charge of discrimination under the bill. It merely permits it to be shown in evidence. This provision is entirely procedural. It does not determine substantive rights, liabilities, and duties. They are fixed in the other provisions of the bill. It leaves it a question of fact to be determined in each case, whether the competition to be met was such as to justify the discrimination given, as one lying within the limitations laid down by the bill, and whether the way in which the competition was met lies within the latitude allowed by those limitations. This procedural provision cannot be construed as a carte blanche exemption to violate the bill so long as a competitor can be shown to have violated it first, nor so long as that competition cannot be met without the use of oppressive discriminations in violation of the obvious intent of the bill. * * * If this proviso were construed to permit the showing of a competing offer as an absolute bar to liability for discrimination, then it would nullify the act entirely at the very inception of its enforcement, for in nearly every case mass buyers receive similar discriminations from competing sellers of the same product. One violation of law cannot be permitted to justify another. As in any case of self-defense, while the attack against which the defense is claimed may be shown in evidence, its competency as a bar depends also upon whether it was a legal or illegal attack. A discrimination in violation of this bill is in practical effect a commercial bribe to lure the business of the favored customer away from the competitor, and if one bribe were permitted to justify another the bill would be futile to achieve its plainly intended purposes."

II

Statutory interpretation: This résumé of the origin and purpose of the original section 2 of the Clayton Act and the amendments of the Robinson-Patman Act gives a basis for determining the effect of this section in a hearing before the Commission where the charge, as here, that a seller during the same period of time has sold the same commodities to various purchasers at different prices, is admitted and the defense, the elements of which are likewise admitted, is that the discrimination was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor. Does meeting in good faith a competitor's price constitute a complete defense under the proviso to section 2 (b)? Or does the fact of good faith reduction in price to a purchaser to meet a competitor's price merely rebut the prima facie establishment of discrimination, arising under the statute from proof of forbidden differences in price,[15] so as to require under section 2 (a) affirmative finding by the Commission that there may be injury to competition? Petitioner asserts that good faith meeing of a competitor's price is a complete defense. The Commission and the Court of Appeals take the opposite position, with which we concur.

This is our reason. The statutory development and the information before Congress concerning the need for strengthening the competitive price provision of the Clayton Act, make clear that the evil dealt with by the proviso of section 2 (b) was the easy avoidance of the prohibition against price-discrimination. The control of that evil was an important objective of the Robinson-Patman Act. The debates, the Commission's report and recommendation and statutory changes show this. The conference report and the explanation by one of the managers, Mr. Utterback, are quite definitive upon the point. Because of experience under the Clayton Act, Congress refused to continue its competitive price proviso. Yet adoption of petitioner's position would permit a seller of nationally distributed goods to discriminate in favor of large chain retailers, for the seller could give to the large retailer a price lower than that charged to small retailers, and could then completely justify its discrimination by showing that the large retailer had first obtained the same low price from a local low-cost producer of competitive goods. This is the very type of competition that Congress sought to remedy. To permit this would not seem consonant with the other provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, strengthening regulatory powers of the Commission in quantity sales, special allowances, and changing economic conditions.

The structure and wording of the Robinson-Patman amendment to the Clayton Act also conduce to our conclusion. In the original Clayton Act, section 2 was not divided into subsections. In that statute, section 2 stated the body of the substantive offense, and then listed, in a series of provisos, various circumstances under which discriminations in price were permissible. Thus, the statute provided that discriminations were not illegal if made on account of differences in the grade of the commodity sold or differences in selling or transportation costs. Listed among these absolute justifications of the Clayton Act appeared the provision that "nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price * * * made in good faith to meet competition." The Robinson-Patman Act, however, made two changes in respect of the meeting-competition provision—one as to its location, the other in the phrasing. Unlike the original statute, section 2 of the Robinson-Patman Act is divided into two subsections. The first, section 2 (a), retained the statement of substantive offense and the series of provisos treated by the Commission as affording full justifications for price discriminations; section 2 (b) was created to deal with procedural problems in Federal Trade Commission proceedings—specifically to treat the question of burden of proof. In the process of this division, the meeting-competition provision was separated from the other provisos, set off from the substantive provisions of section 2 (a), and relegated to the position of a proviso to the procedural subsection, section 2 (b). Unless it is believed that this change of position was fortuitous, it can be inferred that Congress meant to curtail the defense of meeting competition when it banished this proviso from the substantive division to the procedural. In the same way, the language changes made by section 2 (b) of the Robinson-Patman Act reflect an intent to diminish the effectiveness of the sweeping defense offered by the Clayton Act's meeting-of-competition proviso. The original provisos in the Clayton Act, and the provisos now appearing in section 2 (a), are worded to make it clear that nothing shall prevent certain price practices, such as "price differentials * * * [making] * * * due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture," or "price changes * * * in response to changing conditions affecting the market for * * * the goods concerned." But in contrast to these provisions, the proviso to section 2 (b) does not provide that nothing "shall prevent" a certain price practice; it provides only that "nothing shall prevent a seller rebutting * * * [a] * * * prima facie case by showing" a certain price practice—meeting a competitive price. The language thus shifts the focus of the proviso from a matter of substantive defense to a matter of proof. Consistent with each other, these modifications made by the Robinson-Patman Act are also consistent with the intent of Congress expressed in the legislative history.

The Court suggests that former Federal Trade Commission cases decided here have treated the meeting-competition clause of the Robinson-Patman Act as being an absolute defense, not merely a rebuttal of the discrimination charge requiring further finding by the Commission. Reference is made to Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n (324 U. S. 726) and Federal Trade Comm'n v. Staley Mfg. Co. (324 U. S. 746). In the Corn Products case, dealing with a basing-point scheme for delivered prices, this Court merely said at page 741:

"The only evidence said to rebut the prima facie case made by proof of the price discriminations was given by witnesses who had no personal knowledge of the transactions, and was limited to statements of each witness' assumption or conclusion that the price discriminations were justified by competition."

And then went on to use the language quoted at page 12 of the Court's opinion. There was no occasion to consider the effect of a successful rebuttal. As authority for its statement, we there cited the Staley case (at 324 U. S. 746).

That citation included these words at pages 752–753:

"Prior to the Robinson-Patman amendments, section 2 of the Clayton Act provided that nothing contained in it 'shall prevent' discrimination in price 'made in good faith to meet competition.' The change in language of this exception was for the purpose of making the defense a matter of evidence in each case, raising a question of fact as to whether the competition justified the discrimination. See the conference report, House Report No. 2951, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, pages 6–7; see also the statement of Representative Utterback, the chairman of the House conference committee, 80 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 9418."

After that statement, which it should be noted relies upon Mr. Utterback's interpretation quoted at note 14 of this opinion, the Court in the Staley case goes on to say that there was no evidence to show that Staley adopted a lower price to meet an equally low price of a competitor. Again there was no occasion for this court to meet the present issue. We think our citation in Staley quoted above, shows the then position of this Court.[16]

There are aguments available to support the contrary position. No definite statement appears in the committee reports that meeting competition is henceforth to be only a rebuttal of a prima facie case and not a full justification for discrimination in price. The proviso of section 2 (b) can be read as having the same substantive effect as the provisos of section 2 (a). The earlier provisos are treated by the Commission as complete defenses. Perhaps there is an implication favorable to the petitioner's position in Representative PATMAN'S omission to state the Federal Trade Commission interpretation on the floor. See note 12, supra.

The underlying congressional purpose to curtail methods of avoiding limitations on price discriminations, however, considered with the more specific matters discussed herein, satisfies us that we should adopt the conclusion of the Commission and the court of appeals.[17] We believe that good faith meeting of a competitor's price only rebuts the prima facie case of violation established by showing the price discrimination. Whether the proven price discrimination is of a character that violates section 2 (a) then becomes a matter for the determination of the Commission on a showing that there may be injury to competition.

III

Conclusion: In view of the Court's ruling, we will not enlarge this dissent by discussing other problems raised by the case. We have said enough to show that we would affirm the decree below in principle, even though we should conclude some amendment might be required in the wording of the order.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Black join in this dissent.

[15] See note 6, supra.

[16] The Court's opinion in this case refers, page 12, notes 12 and 13, to the opinions of the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Staley and Corn Products (144 F. 2d and 221). But that court reversed its position in the opinion below (173 F. 2d 210, 216). It is fair to assume that reversal was because of our opinions in Corn Products and Staley.

[17] It is hardly necessary to note that the wisdom of the enactment is not for the Commission nor the courts in enforcing the act. The Commission recently has advised Congress that while "on balance it would be preferable to make the good faith meeting of competition a complete defense," it "does not strongly urge either view upon the Congress." Hearings before Subcommittee No. 1 of the House Committee on the Judiciary on S. 1008, 81st Cong., 1st sess., June 8 and 14, 1949, p. 61. Compare Standard Oil Co. v. United States (337 U. S. 293, 311). This statement confirmed the Commission's position taken in this case. There were other officials of the Commission who have taken the view adopted by the Court.

PROGRAM FOR ACQUISITION OF WOOL AND INCREASING GROWTH OF THE GUAYULE SHRUB

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Armed Services I want my colleagues to know that we are as ready to commend as we are to criticize. When we find something in the defense mobilization program that deserves praise we are as willing and anxious to point out that fact as we are to comment upon deficiencies in that program.

Vigorous action to correct deficiencies and omissions in defense mobilization as soon as they have been ascertained is praiseworthy indeed.

The new Chairman of the Munitions Board, Mr. John D. Small, has shown that the Board can and will take prompt action. As the committee has recently recommended, wool and guayule seed and seedlings have now been placed on the strategic and critical materials' list for stockpiling. This action is definitely a substantial step in the right direction. By taking this step Chairman Small has corrected serious omissions of his predecessors, and I hope that aggresive programs for acquiring wool and preparing to grow natural rubber in the United States will finally repair the damage resulting from inaction over the past 3 years.

The Preparedness Subcommittee's first and second reports stressed the need for growing, or preparing to grow, natural rubber from guayule within the boundaries of the United States. The President's rubber program as reported to the subcommittee by Mr. Stuart Symington, chairman of the National Security Resources Board, included the planning and studies on preliminary actions that should be taken to grow natural rubber in this country. I am happy to report that an active program to increase the available seed needed to grow guayule shrub is under way. In addition, test acreages of guayule shrub will be set out in various parts of the country believed adapted to its growth in order to give farmers experience in growing this crop and to make certain what areas and what soils are best suited for large production should our supplies of natural rubber from the Far East be curtailed or cut off.

My esteemed and hard-working fellow committee member, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT] developed for the Senate Armed Services Committee, long before formation of the Preparedness Subcommittee, the lamentable and distressing shortage of wool. His early efforts, along with the recent study by the Preparedness Subcommittee set forth in the third report, have been notable contributions which have finally moved the defense agencies.

I hope we have time to obtain the wool we need. I am sure we are on the right road in actively planning to grow natural rubber in this country if we have to. The actions announced recently by Chairman Small of the Munitions Board are definitely steps in the right direction. He deserves commendation for it. Other agencies could learn from his example.

Mr. President, I desire now to refer to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

IMPRACTICABILITY OF VOLUNTARY PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on August 12 of last year, I pointed out that it would be useless to increase taxes if prices were permitted to rise to such a point that the tax gain would be erased through the necessity of paying continually advancing prices for war materials.

On September 12, I placed in the RECORD a tabulation showing how prices had advanced out of all proportion on hundreds of essential items.

On September 22, I cited in the RECORD a few of the more flagrant instances: The increase by 111 percent in the price of crude rubber since the attack on Korea; the increase by more than 30 percent, over a period of only a few months, in the price of aviation gasoline; an increase from 22 to 42 percent, between April and September, in the price of the cloth from which uniforms are made.

On December 12, I asked the Senate once more "What are we waiting for?" and pointed out the alarming fact that on November 28 the wholesale price index reached an all-time record high of 171.7.

At that time I quoted certain figures demonstrating that since April 1950 the price of burlap had increased 75.6 percent; the price of copper was up 32.6 percent; the price of hides was up 50.8 percent; the price of wool had been boosted 67.6 percent; and the price of crude rubber had increased an unbelievable 209.5 percent.

In line with my promise to show again and again, through facts and figures, the impracticability of voluntary controls during wartime, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a statement entitled "Military Procurement Price Trends," and a tabulation of "Military Procurement Prices Before and After the Attack on Korea," both prepared by the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

There being no objection, the statement and tabulation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILITARY PROCUREMENT PRICE TRENDS

Since the spring of 1950, prices have risen markedly, particularly after the start of the conflict in Korea. The Bureau of Labor Statistics wholesale-price index is now at an all-time high, reaching a level of 171.7 on November 28, a rise of 12.3 percent since April 1950 and an increase of 2.5 percent during the past 2 months. Many basic raw materials have increased in price to an even greater extent than have finished commodities, including a number of key commodities used in the manufacture of items required by the armed services, as shown by the following table:

Commodity	Unit	Price			Percent increase
		April 1950	Sept. 8, 1950	Dec. 4, 1950	April to September	April to December	September to December
Burlap	Yard	$0.172	$0.242	$0.302	40.7	75.6	24.8
Copper	Pound	.184	.234	.244	27.2	32.6	4.3
Cotton	do	.320	.407	.412	27.2	28.8	1.2
Crude rubber	do	.210	.550	.650	161.9	209.5	18.2
Hides	do	.242	.330	.365	36.4	50.8	10.6
Lead	do	.105	.160	.170	52.4	61.9	6.2
Print cloth, cotton	Yard	.140	.210	.225	50.0	60.7	7.1
Steel scrap (Philadelphia)	Ton	24.000	38.000	38.500	58.3	60.4	1.3
Tin	Pound	.750	.990	1.390	32.0	85.3	40.4
Wool tops	do	1.870	3.020	3.135	61.5	67.6	3.8
Zinc	do	.112	.182	.182	62.5	62.5

Due to the existence of fixed price contracts for many items, the rise in basic commodity prices was not fully and immediately reflected in procurement prices paid by the armed services. However, the increase in general price level is being felt more and more by the armed services. With the exception of meats, the price of which has dropped seasonally during the past 2 months, and a few other scattered items, higher prices are being encountered in an ever increasing number of items. These price rises are becoming increasingly widespread despite efforts to reduce costs wherever feasible by simplification of specifications and substitution of materials. The recent steel industry wage and price increases will undoubtedly lead to further increases in the prices of many military procurement items.

One of the key commodities affected by the Korean conflict has been aviation gasoline. Preliminary screening of offers for delivery of aviation gasoline starting in January 1951 indicates the following price increases per gallon for normal production:

	July 1, 1950, average	November 1950 average quotation for January 1951 delivery	Percent increase
Grade 115/145 Avgas:
United States Gulf	$0.1675	$0.1725	3.0
West coast	.1565	.1775	13.4
Grade 100/130 Avgas:
United States Gulf	.155	.16	3.2
West coast	.144	.165	14.6

However, normal production is not adequate to meet current armed services' needs for aviation gasoline. Consequently, part of the aviation gasoline supplies of the armed services are being derived from marginal production, utilizing materials, plant facilities, and transportation practices that are not economical under normal conditions. As a result, premiums of varying amounts are being paid for the supply increments furnished from marginal sources, ranging from 5 to 45 percent, depending upon the particular circumstances involved.

It must be recognized that it is difficult to compare prices at different times for much of the matériel procured by the armed services because of changes in quantities involved, changes in specifications, changes in manufacturing methods and processing techniques, resort to marginal producers or methods, existence of price redetermination clauses in contracts, etc. Direct price comparisons can best be made on relatively standard-type items that are subject to little change in specifications. Such a list of representative items, indicating procurement prices applicable to each of the services and to the Armed Services Petroleum Purchasing Agency, is contained in the attached table:

LEAKAGE OF DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE MILITARY MESSAGES

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate to compliment the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] for the patriotic service he has rendered the Nation in exposing the leakage of Department of Defense military messages.

For some time administration apologists have been searching for a way to escape responsibility for the disaster in Korea. The administration and its apologists seem to have settled on Gen. Douglas MacArthur as the scapegoat.

In reference to that campaign, I wish to point out that Gen. Douglas MacArthur was not present at Tehran, Yalta, or Potsdam when the foundations for the present disaster in Asia were laid. Douglas MacArthur had no part in pulling the rug from under Nationalist China and in setting the stage for Russian domination of Asia.

Douglas MacArthur went into Korea, not on his own initiative, but on orders of the President of the United States. It was on orders from the President that Douglas MacArthur went into Korea with inadequately armed and green troops.

When Douglas MacArthur and his fighting men had the Communists on the run, and could have destroyed them, he stopped his troops at the thirty-eighth parallel, on orders from Washington. This gave the Reds time to catch their breath and reform their disorganized forces.

Douglas MacArthur refrained from ordering his airmen to bomb enemy troop concentrations at the Korean border, on orders from Washington. This allowed the enemy to marshal its forces and build up its strength without annoyance.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur has not been allowed to accept the proffered assistance of several hundred thousand Chinese Nationalist fighting men who are willing and anxious to go into battle against communism. This, too, is on orders from Washington.

All these things have been done by Washington, from which originates the campaign to shift to General MacArthur the blame for the military disaster in Korea.

General MacArthur is a field commander whose hands are tied by political strings reaching from his headquarters to the White House, in Washington, to Lake Success.

The junior Senator from Wisconsin, in his exposure of the source of the information which has formed the principal basis for the MacArthur smear, is pulling up and exposing the very taproot of the campaign to discredit MacArthur. In doing this, the junior Senator from Wisconsin has had the courage to go to the mat with one of the Nation's most powerful columnists. He has found that this columnist had access to, and quoted excerpts from, classified military communications from our commander in the field to his superiors at the Pentagon. Those messages concern the strength of the forces now overwhelming our troops in Korea. After their leakage those classified military messages were largely used as the basis for the smear campaign against MacArthur.

Both General MacArthur and his staff were held up to ridicule and censure on the allegation that their intelligence services were inaccurate and otherwise faulty.

Thus it was insinuated that General MacArthur and many of his closest advisers were uninformed and incompetent. It was insidiously hinted that MacArthur and his aides were confused as to the exact number of the opposing forces, and that because of this confusion our troops were led into defeat in Korea.

I have information to the effect that it is standard practice to attach to classified documents the following or similar warning, which is notice of the consequences of violations of security:

This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws, title 18, United States Code, sections 793 and 794. Transmission or revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law; it is imperative that the material contained in it be treated with the utmost discretion. Under no circumstances shall possession thereof, or the information therein, be given to any personnel other than those whose duties specifically require knowledge thereof. When not in use this document is chargeable to the custody of an officer.

Along with other Members of the United States Senate, I am anxiously awaiting the outcome of the active investigation the Army says it is conducting. It is my hope that the inquiry will lead to a court martial and the subsequent punishment of such military personnel as may have had a hand in the affair, if a violation of the law has occurred. If it should develop that the information leak was perpetrated by a civilian employee of the Defense Department, that civilian should be punished to the full extent of the law.

I also hope that this incident will tend to bring into disrepute the kind of "inside story" reporting which is all too prevalent these days. That kind of reporting too often finds origin in the privileged status of certain types of writers, who in reality are not reporters, but propagandists.

These alleged reporters have access in many of our Federal Government buildings, to private dining rooms, and other hide-aways which are not generally accessible to the working press. In return for this privileged status they too often lend themselves to opinion peddling, rather than news reporting.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this episode is a proper subject of investigation by either the Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction of espionage matters, or by the Armed Services Committee.

I request unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the Associated Press story about this matter. The account is taken from the Saturday, January 13, 1951, issue of the New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMY INQUIRES INTO SOURCE OF PEARSON'S DATA—PACE, ANSWERING MCCARTHY, SAYS COLUMNIST QUOTED FROM SECRET MESSAGES

WASHINGTON, January 12.—The Army said today the Drew Pearson column of December 30 contained "quoted excerpts from classified (secret) messages," and an investigation is being made.

In a letter to Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, Republican, Wisconsin, Secretary of the Army Frank Pace also said the matter is being submitted to the Judge Advocate General, the Army's top legal officer.

Mr. Pace made the letter public. It was in response to a demand from Senator MCCARTHY to know whether material in the Pearson column was in fact quoted from secret messages, as Mr. Pearson said. Senator MCCARTHY said in a Senate speech last week that if Mr. Pearson had quoted secret messages he had given aid to foreign countries in efforts to break United States codes.

SAID HE HAD PERMISSION

Mr. Pearson replied in a statement at the time that he had been told by the Pentagon that it was all right for him to use the messages if he changed dates and altered a few words.

Mr. Pace told the Senator the whole matter is being actively investigated. He said the Army had not given Mr. Pearson any secret messages or any messages at all from General of the Army Douglas MacArthur's headquarters.

Mr. Pace said the Army "did not give Mr. Pearson permission to publish the secret military messages you referred to nor any other classified information."

Mr. Pearson's December 30 column said in effect that reports from General MacArthur's headquarters and his intelligence chief showed the Chinese Red strength in Korea was considerably weaker than the general's published statements indicated.

Mr. Pace's letter was in reply to one Senator MCCARTHY sent him Monday. One question Senator MCCARTHY asked was whether publication of the texts of coded messages, even with the change of a few words and the date, would not "materially help enemy experts to break United States military codes."

SAYS CODE IS NOT BROKEN

Mr. Pace told Senator MCCARTHY that "in this instance it has been established that cryptographic security has not been violated," but said he was unable for security reasons to explain why.

Mr. Pace said the specific matter submitted to the Judge Advocate General was this question from Senator MCCARTHY: "Was not whoever handed Pearson those messages guilty of a violation of our espionage laws?"

After Mr. Pace released his letter Mr. Pearson issued a statement which said the basic fact is that General MacArthur's press communiques in early December reported the Chinese to be 1,000,000 strong, but his cables to the Pentagon gave the Chinese strength as only about 100,000. He added:

"Publication 3 weeks after the retreat obviously could violate no security nor endanger American forces.

"Senator MCCARTHY seems much more interested in getting at me than in getting the true facts to the country."

PRESIDENTIAL POWER TO DEPLOY TROOPS ABROAD

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I shall today detain the Senate but briefly, but I should like to call attention to the fact that while we are engaged in what the country generally considers and accepts as a great debate on foreign policy, it is unfortunately true that considerable amounts of time and attention and study have had to be devoted in the United States Senate to a collateral issue not directly connected with foreign policy; that is, the determination of a constitutional question concerning the right or propriety of the President, as Commander in Chief, to send forces abroad without consultation with Congress and consent by Congress.

It occurs to me, since we hear almost every day impassioned appeals from the Democratic side of the aisle and from the officers uptown that we should have national unity and national cooperation, that the one man in the United States who is prepared today and equipped to strike a tremendous blow for unity is President Harry S. Truman, in his position as Commander in Chief. He alone can put an end to this collateral debate, which is consuming so much time that actually we have had very little opportunity as yet to get down to the very important matter of building a constructive, positive foreign policy.

Most of our time has been devoted to a determination of what we are going to fight with, rather than what we are going to fight for. It seems to me that until and unless we determine what we are going to fight for and what our outline of foreign policy might properly be, we cannot very well determine what is going to be required to fight with. One precedes the other and, once we have determined what we are going to fight for, we then come to the problem of how we are going to raise and equip the army, and of how it is to be commanded.

Only the President, I submit, Mr. President, has the power to put an end to this debate. I think it could be argued rather persuasively from the President's point of view, as some of his friends are endeavoring to argue, that the Commander in Chief under the Constitution of the United States has a considerable degree of power to order the troops of the country to serve where he thinks their service is important and necessary. That constitutional reference or right has been argued almost since the beginning of time in the United States; and some Presidents, having been a little more high-handed and headstrong than others, have taken more advantage of it than others. Some Presidents, more interested in national unity and considering the position of Congress more adequately, have refrained from acting in any way that might be construed as a defiance of Congress.

I submit that it can also be argued very persuasively from the congressional point of view that the Constitution imposes upon us, as a Congress, certain very significant controls as to where troops are to be sent and as to how they are to be deployed, because we, and we alone, are charged by the Constitution with the right to raise and equip and supply the military forces and to appropriate the essential money. So if we have on the one hand a high-handed, headstrong President, looking constantly for increasing personal power and trying to decrease steadily the importance of the Congress, it is possible, of course, to stymie and stalemate the entire foreign policy debate, while the constitutional question is argued till the cows come home, or to the end of the congressional session.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator has already touched on it in part. The powers of Congress are not limited to a single control over the subject matter. There are four or five specific controls over our military establishments provided by the Constitution. One is the power to provide for the common defense. That has no limits. It is our responsibility. It is our grant of unlimited power.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It says so in exact words. We do not have to draw implications. It also says we have the power to declare war. This carries its own implications of very wide scope, inclusive and exclusive. We also have the power to raise and support armies. We also have the power to provide and maintain a navy, and we also have the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of it as may be employed in the service of the United States. While the President has a vast field of implied power, arising out of the fact that the Constitution makes him our Chief Executive and our Commander in Chief, the Congress also by the express terms and implication of the Constitution, which I have mentioned, is not without armor in this debate or in action to be proposed or taken.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator very much for his contribution, and I think it should be clear to all students of the Constitution that the constitutional founders were much more meticulous and much more comprehensive in reposing in the Congress those specific controls we have in connection with the Army and our military forces than they were in regard to the implications they made in the direction of the power of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. WATKINS and Mr. FERGUSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. MUNDT. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATKINS. I note the Senator said the Congress would have power to curtail these operations, by the control of the purse in providing for the Army. Is it not a fact, however, that such control means very little, if the President goes ahead and orders our troops into situations in a manner which brings on a war?

Mr. MUNDT. That certainly is true, of course, because in such situations as the one we have now in Korea, it is unthinkable that any Congress will refuse to appropriate the money required to complete the task in which we are engaged and to protect our troops in the fighting theater.

Mr. WATKINS. In other words, if our troops are actually engaged in combat, if our boys are on the battlefield fighting, or even our Navy and our Air Force, it is unlikely then that the Congress would reverse itself and try to control the President in his actions by denying appropriations to furnish our troops, our Air Force, and our Navy with necessary equipment for the fighting, and the additional troops to support them in whatever action they are undertaking or are compelled to undertake in order to save their lives, and to save, so to speak, the face of the United States.

Mr. MUNDT. Under such conditions, I would say it is not only unlikely, but unthinkable that Congress would take such action.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true that the framers of the Constitution had in mind that both Houses of the Congress were to have something to say about the use of the Army and the size of the Army when they included the 2-year limitation upon appropriations for the Army of the United States? By that provision the chief executive, who is the Commander in Chief and treated really as a part of the Army, was precluded from obtaining sufficient funds in advance to enable him to use the Army in any way he desired.

Mr. MUNDT. The junior Senator from Michigan has put his finger on a very pertinent point. Unquestionably that was one of the facts which motivated our constitutional father in establishing that provision.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I take a rather liberal view of the President's powers. I would not for a moment try to circumscribe them. But, by the same token, we are also entitled to a rather liberal view as to our express and implied powers under the Constitution. I have made a rather careful study of the Constitution and have found nothing in it which contains any prohibition against the use of common sense or of constructive cooperation between the so-called independent branches of the Government. I thought it was a shocking and a very foolish thing when the President said that he was willing to go to the people on this issue. The issue went to the people last November. But if he wishes it that way, he may go again to the people, but I think the result will be the same, or even worse for him. I hope the President will come to realize that there is no prohibition against his acting in honest cooperation with the Congress, so that we can work these things out without any conflict of constitutional jurisdiction, or assuming——

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is anticipating precisely why I took the floor this afternoon. That is exactly the thing I am recommending to the President, that instead of taking this headstrong attitude, this royal and superior attitude of utterly defying the Congress, of registering his contempt therefor and saying that he will carry the issue to the people, there is a simple, respectable, logical, and persuasive course he can take by employing the rule of common sense and saying, "We are working together as a Government comprised of coordinate branches, and the President and the Congress must move forward together, rather than fighting and quibbling about constitutional powers."

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan did not have in mind that Congress had the power to designate where the Armed Forces would fight and exactly when they would fight. Rather, in view of these provisions of the Constitution relative to the limitation upon the term of appropriations for the military, he had in mind that certain limitations do exist in this field which apply to both the Congress and the Executive.

As a result of those limitations the President and Congress, in effect, would have to work as a team in using the Armed Forces of the Nation. Such cooperation overcomes any inherent danger of any one man, connected with the military, as the President is by reason of his status as Commander in Chief, obtaining from the people large appropriations in order that he might use the military in the future in any way he saw fit.

By placing these provisions in the Constitution, the framers were reminding the President and the Congress of their accountability to the people of America in whom the sovereign power actually resides. Neither the President nor Congress has the right to take from the people the powers bestowed upon them in recognition of certain inalienable rights. When both the Congress and the President recognize those rights as the keystone of our liberties in America, there will be no trouble between Congress and the President. We will do the things that are morally right for the people of America and we will take the advice of the people in connection with what the people think is actually morally right.

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct. I rather think that if we could bring out of the archives of the past, spokesmen from the days of the writing of the Constitution they would be amazed and appalled to find this country, in this hazardous time, concentrating on a debate as to whether the President or Congress alone is to have the control of the armies of the United States. I think, by the very manner in which the framers of the Constitution approached the problem, they expected Congress and the President to work, in the words of the junior Senator from Michigan, as a team. Certainly I see no basis for the White House and the State Department calling upon the Nation for unity and upon Congress for cooperation, in one breath, if, in the next breath, the President at a press conference says, "We propose to defy Congress. We have the power to send troops anywhere we want to, and at any time, and we are going to exercise that power. If Congress tries to exercise any power to the contrary I will carry the issue to the country."

I think that would be an amazing spectacle to the men who wrote the Constitution.

If the President proposes to adhere to that viewpoint, we can continue such a debate throughout the session of the Congress. We in Congress have certain inalienable rights, and we would be derelict in our responsibility to the people who sent us here unless we maintain control over the purse strings and unless we maintain the right to declare war, and the right we possess in connection with the recruiting and supplying of troops.

So I suggest an easy answer to the predicament in which we find ourselves. I propose that President Truman, between now and the time we intend to vote upon this issue next week, proclaim to the country that the constitutional debate is over, that he, as the President, is not going to involve the United States and its troops in foreign actions abroad without conferring with Congress and securing its prior consent; that before making commitment to send American troops to Europe to implement the Atlantic Pact or to patrol the boundaries of Europe he will seek and secure approval by Congress.

Then there would be no cause for this constitutional debate, Mr. President. Then we can move forward as a team. Then we can move forward, each trusting the other.

If, on the other hand, by the verdict to be recorded in the Senate next week the President's side wins—suppose that by cracking the whiplash over the backs of Democratic Members he should have enough votes to send the Wherry measure to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where it will be as dead as Banquo—is that going to satisfy the country? Is that going to satisfy those of us who vote in opposition? Is that going to allay any fear or dissipate any suspicion? Or will it be simply a red warning sign to the country that here is a man who is determined to rule by Executive fiat, that here is a man who wants to defy Congress, who was able to pigeonhole the resolution so that we cannot move forward, and so he can send the boys now being recruited any place, anywhere, at any time, by Executive fiat, and with a royal wave of his hand? Is that going to give us national unity? I think not, Mr. President.

Suppose, on the other hand, those of us who support the resolution win; suppose we are able to influence enough supporters from the other side and among reluctant associates on our side, to win by a narrow margin. What does that accomplish? Where does that leave us in the public viewpoint? We have the satisfaction, I suppose, of defeating the President in a proposal which he should never have made. We have cautioned him that the Congress is still on the job, and even more on the job than it was 2 years ago at this time. But I think that is not a very happy answer, either, because we do not know whether he is going to follow that resolution. Suppose he should ignore it? Then what would happen?

Does anyone think the Congress of the United States is going to impeach the President while Congress is comprised of a majority of his own party members? If we should, would that strengthen us in the eyes of foreign nations? I think not.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to suggest that I think the President will be duty bound to maintain his own constitutional powers and that he would not, and I think he should not, make any kind of a statement that would perpetually limit his own constitutional powers. But he certainly could say that so far as implementation of the North Atlantic Pact is concerned, in connection with which we were told, in debate, that there would be congressional control over the subject, he could certainly go so far as to say that, as a matter of policy if not of constitutional law, he would not move without the instructions of Congress.

Mr. MUNDT. Precisely. That is the point at issue today.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I voted for the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. MUNDT. So did I.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I never would have dreamed of voting for it had we not received assurance that Congress would retain control over the size and general use of the forces.

Mr. MUNDT. We sought and received clear-cut assurances then that we would be consulted now.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think we should be careful not to press the President to where he can rightfully take the position that "I, as the trustee of Presidential powers, have no right to yield my own powers, and you should not ask me to do so, while at the same time asking that I respect your constitutional powers." But if we limit it to the North Atlantic Pact we are on sound ground, and he should be the first to recognize it.

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct. If he initiates that kind of move toward national harmony and unity and the restoration of public confidence, it is much better than being compelled to do it by some kind of congressional resolution.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I believe the Senator has made a very valuable contribution to the debate.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator. I conclude with the statement that under present conditions the only court of competent jurisdiction for rendering a satisfactory and enduring verdict as to whether or not the President's position with regard to troops and their movement is correct, or whether the congressional position is correct, is the court of public opinion. That court does not convene until November 1952. In the meantime we have conditions to meet and we have problems to solve. We should be debating in all sincerity the formulation and proclamation of a foreign policy which our fellow citizens and our friends abroad can understand. Certainly we have no such policy as of today. We have no such proclamation. I venture to say that no Senator could stand on the floor of the Senate and explain in a 1-minute speech or in a 10-hour speech what our American foreign policy is toward Asia. We do not have any policy toward over half the people in the world. We have a day-to-day, catch-as-catch-can series of frightened and frightening reactions to something that the Russians are saying or that the Russians are doing. What the world needs and what America needs is a clear American foreign policy, brought about by a meeting of minds in honest debate, which foreign policy, when it is proclaimed, will be as easily understood as the Monroe Doctrine was understood in its day. It should be as clear, precise, cogent, positive, and courageous. We should have such a foreign policy, instead of continually and perpetually being bound by the kind of policy we have today, which is little more than a series of belated reactions to something which the Kremlin initiates, what Pravda or Izvestia says, or what the Communist conspirators and transgressors do or say.

Certainly somewhere in the world there is an American position. We ought to be able to arrive at an American foreign policy. As Americans we have responsibilities. We have a responsibility in this world as Americans, as members of a global community, and as believers in freedom, which we should be willing to develop, and to the development of which we should be willing to devote our time and talents, free from the controversy of whether the President of the United States can get by with defying Congress, or whether Congress, on the other hand, can get by with defying the President through its hold on the purse strings.

If the President will speak out and remove the problem from present consideration by making a plain and definite declaration that he will not move into this Atlantic community with any proposal with respect to American troops without consultation with Congress in advance, and without first securing approval of Congress for his actions, we can devote ourselves to these tremendous and urgent problems of writing, preparing, developing, and supporting a foreign policy which the world, the people at home, and the boys fighting in Korea can understand.

Then we can start talking about how to raise an army, at what age boys shall be called up for service, under what methods they are to be called up, how to train them, where to send them, and how to equip them. Then we can start talking about the problem of financing our effort, how to get the money, and how to raise the taxes. Then we can start talking about the immediately important problems of how to mobilize our economy, and how to get ready. That is what we should be doing, instead of constantly acting as though the President were waging war on Congress, or Congress waging war on the President. It is a situation for which the President must assume full responsibility, having told the country, "I will defy the Congress, if need be, and send troops to any place at any time I choose." Having declared this forensic war, he is the man to call it off. We would then be able to settle down to a consideration of much more urgent business if the President were to make the declaration I suggest. Then the public would have confidence that we are moving forward as a team, and that we are moving forward as a government of coordinate branches, instead of competitive branches. Were we to do so, certainly we would present a stronger front to the enemies of freedom, regardless of what foreign policy we eventually decided upon.

PRECEPTS OF OTHER DAYS AS A GUIDE FOR ACTION—LETTER FROM JAMES T. WYATT

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, under date of December 13, 1950, I received a letter from Mr. James T. Wyatt, who is associated with radio station KOIN in Portland, Oreg. Because the letter is clear in its statements, because it is cogent, because it is analytical, because it is objective, because it is exactly in line with the remarks just made by the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and because it brings back to our minds the necessity of reverting to history and to the precepts of others in days gone by, I desire to read the letter into the Record at this time:

PORTLAND, OREG.,
December 13, 1950.

The Honorable GUY CORDON,
Senator from Oregon, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CORDON: It is frequently stated that our Senators and Representatives in Congress welcome individual views of the citizenry. With this in mind, I take the liberty of writing you about the serious dilemma facing our Nation.

The first half of this twentieth century presents a strange contrast. It witnessed great attainments by the United States in material well-being and also in that spiritual stature which overcomes racial hatreds, and gives succor to the oppressed and respect to the minority.

But on a global scale, the half century has been one of the most violent and destructive in the history of man. Our Nation became engulfed in two world wars, and on both occasions emerged victorious but lacked the statecraft to win the peace.

We are now being drawn into another vortex of global violence. Our competent generals have in recent weeks been assigned well-nigh impossible tasks; and our gallant troops have ridden into the Valley of Death, as did the Light Brigade at Balaklava, because "someone has blundered".

There is talk of bipartisan policy or the lack of it. Let me pose a simile. A ship is steered by its captain, upon whose competency rests the fate of passengers and crew. But the captain does not guess at the stars nor make emotional judgments on navigation. He must operate on proven principles.

In our American captaincy on foreign seas there are two outstanding and historic principles of navigation in United States statecraft. These were set down and proven by George Washington and Theodore Roosevelt. Sound and solid today as when originated, they are:

1. Avoid foreign entanglements.
2. Speak softly and carry a big stick.

There is plenty of latitude in these precepts to cover the changes of time and history and to meet new responsibilities. Washington's precept does not adjure against foreign dealings or interests, but against entanglement. Theodore Roosevelt believed in a strong voice in international affairs, but he adjured against a loud mouth and too little power.

These precepts remain the wise formula upon which our Nation achieved its sound position in the world.

As a citizen of Oregon, I urge you to do your utmost to reestablish these proven principles as a guide to our bewildered statecraft, to the end that America may again earn the admiration of the world.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES T. WYATT.

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 18, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of infinite love and mercy, who art always seeking to guide and direct us into the nobler ways of life, help us to interpret all Thy righteous commands and judgments as gracious invitations to follow the paths which Thou hast marked out for us.

Grant that we may see more clearly that Thou art not commanding or expecting our finite minds to comprehend fully Thy divine will and Thy dealings with us, but that Thou art calling us to trust and obey Thee faithfully.

We pray that Thou wilt help us to understand that the measure of our faith and obedience is the measure of our wisdom and strength and peace.

Inspire us daily with a larger faith and a deepening assurance that there is no crisis which we cannot face, and no hardship which we cannot endure when our minds and hearts are stayed on Thee and when we place our hands in Thine.

In Christ's name we bring our petitions. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 15, 1951, was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs I may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file a report on the bill H. R. 1.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

AMENDING CHAPTER 26 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 73) amending chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not like to have all this legislation coming up by unanimous consent, particularly when there has been no opportunity to consider these measures. Therefore, it not having been brought to my attention that unanimous consent would be asked today to bring up this bill, I shall be obliged to object, until that rule has been complied with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. This bill has the support of all the departments concerned. It has the unanimous approval of our committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I know, but we have not had an opportunity to examine it. I feel that it is my duty to the Members of the House at least to have examined it personally before any legislation comes up. We are liable to put a lot of legislation through otherwise that might be objected to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I can understand the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I should like to have the gentleman withdraw his request until I have had an opportunity to examine the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is all right to withdraw it, but this bill is identical with one that passed the House in the last Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not care whether or not it was passed, I do not know that, and I feel that in justice to the Members on this side of the House I ought to be fully informed about it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina withdraws the request.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation from a committee:

JANUARY 16, 1951.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation to serve on the Public Works Committee, effective immediately.

Sincerely yours,

EARL CHUDOFF,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION OF MODERN NAVAL VESSELS

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1001) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1001, with Mr. RAINS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 25 minutes and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill which is now before you for consideration embraces the immediate program of the Navy for the construction and conversion of naval vessels.

At the outset I want to emphasize one point. Under normal conditions this program, which involves the expenditure of approximately $2,000,000,000, would not be requested in its entirety, but would be phased over a number of years into the future, at least through 1954. However, the critical state of world affairs demands that we accelerate the Navy preparedness program in the same manner that we have already accelerated corresponding programs for the Army and the Air Force. As a result, the Navy preparedness programs for the next 3 years have been telescoped in the interest of national security. I also want to emphasize that the acceleration of this program is not a unilateral idea on the part of the Navy. It has the full concurrence of the entire Military Establisment and the President.

We must recognize the fact that there are categories of ships in which the Navy suffers from numerical deficiencies—it has too few for its needs. Some of the antisubmarine warfare types and some of the mine-sweeping types are examples of deficiency.

There are other categories in which the Navy suffers from obsolescence. Improvements in Navy weapons or enhanced capabilities of a prospective enemy require the construction of new ships. The Navy proposes to do all it can to meet its needs in these categories by converting ships already in being. Conversions, however, valuable as they are, cannot entirely meet that need. The Navy has greatly strengthened its war potential by conversions of conventional submarines to snorkel submarines and by placing modern antisubmarine weapons in existing destroyer types. Conversion of Essex-type carriers has helped, will continue to help, and must be continued, but the time has come to construct a new carrier—a successor to, and an improvement upon, the Essex and Midway types. This bill would authorize the construction of such a ship.

Generally speaking, this program is divided into two phases: First, new construction, which emphasizes antisubmarine vessels and mine sweepers; and, second, conversion of existing vessels, which emphasizes carriers and antisubmarine vessels.

New construction, the first phase of the program, consists of 500,000 tons of naval vessels. This would permit the construction of 173 new vessels as follows: 1 aircraft carrier of approximately 57,000 tons, 22 mine sweepers, 30 mine-sweeper boats, 7 submarines, 2 ocean escorts, 12 fleet tankers, 2 rocket ships, 1 ice breaker, 66 landing ships, 30 smaller vessels of various types.

These vessels, with the exception of the aircraft carrier, can be completed in a period of 2 years. The completion of the aircraft carrier will require 3½ years.

For security reasons the characteristics, capabilities, and improvements which will be embodied in these new vessels are omitted.

The second phase of this program consists of the conversion of 1,000,000 tons of existing naval vessels. This would permit the conversion of 291 existing vessels as follows: Six Essex-type carriers to accommodate improved jet aircraft, 12 cruisers, 2 guided missile cruisers, 194 destroyers, 12 radar picket destroyers, 31 landing craft, 34 smaller vessels of various types.

As in the case of new construction, the characteristics, capabilities, and types of improvements in these converted vessels are omitted for security reasons.

It should be noted that the new construction program, in addition to providing for the construction of a carrier, places emphasis upon mine sweeping craft and upon amphibious and landing ships; while the conversion program emphasizes the carrier and antisubmarine ships.

The carrier force continues to be the backbone of naval offensive power. The Navy has long been conscious of the submarine menace, but the mine threat is one that has been brought closely home as recently as the Korean campaign. And, in like manner, Korea has demonstrated the great desirability of proficiency in amphibious operations. Naval shore bombardment from surface ships has also proved its continued usefulness in recent months and days. We are fortunate, however, in having a reserve of battleships and cruisers and thus nothing is proposed in this field, at present, beyond modernizing the antiaircraft batteries of some of our cruisers.

In view of past controversies over the construction of a larger aircraft carrier, I want to briefly review the background of events which has led to the favorable decision to construct such a carrier.

During the late phases of the past war, carrier task force commanders reported an ever increasing need for larger, heavier, carrier-based aircraft to accomplish war missions. To accommodate these larger aircraft, they strongly recommended construction of an aircraft carrier larger than either the 27,000-ton Essex class or the 45,000-ton Midway class. The late Admiral Mark Mitscher, commander of the famed Task Force 58, instituted the original studies which resulted in the Navy recommendation for the construction of a 65,000-ton flush-deck aircraft carrier. Planning was undertaken in January 1946. By October 1947 plans had become sufficiently firm to justify a budget request for the construction of this carrier. Such a request was accordingly submitted in the Navy budget for 1949. That request was approved by the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Defense—the late James Forrestal—the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and by the President, and funds to undertake construction of the carrier were contained in the appropriation act of 1949.

The contract for the construction of the 65,000-ton carrier United States was awarded to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. on April 10, 1948. The keel was laid at Newport News on April 18, 1949. Construction of the carrier was canceled by Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson on April 23, 1949. At the time of cancellation, the estimated cost of constructing the carrier was $189,000,000. The termination settlement agreement between the Government and the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. was concluded on December 21, 1950, at a cost to the Government of $2,718,672.

On three specific occasions the House of Representatives approved the construction of the aircraft carrier United States. The enactment of H. R. 6049, Eightieth Congress, was an implied authorization since it suspended work on 13 vessels in order to make the funds available for the carrier. Appropriation of the first increment of funds in the fiscal 1949 budget constituted the second approval. Appropriation of the second increment of funds was included in the fiscal 1950 Appropriation Act, which was passed by the House prior to the cancellation of the carrier.

The carrier which is proposed in H. R. 1001 is a further development of the Midway class. It will be of approximately 57,000 standard displacement tons and of flush deck design. Therefore, it is approximately 12,000 tons larger than the Midway class and approximately 10,000 tons smaller than the U. S. S. United States, which was canceled. It is intended as a base from which modern carrier aircraft may be operated, and it will accommodate bombers which are capable of waging atomic warfare. It is not a revolutionary weapon, but is an improved conventional carrier into which the lessons of World War II and thereafter will be built.

The ship will have increased catapult and arresting capacity, larger elevators, and higher hangar decks overhead in order to accommodate larger and faster planes. There will be added armor protection and improved underwater protection. Fire-fighting and electronic capabilities will be improved. The construction of this ship will not render the Midway-type or the modernized Essex-type of carriers obsolete. Its construction will place the Navy in a position of having at least a prototype for the test and operation of new carrier planes, the development of which may now reasonably be foreseen. The cost, under current dollar values, is estimated to be $235,000,000, approximately $45,000,000 more than the carrier United States. The principal reason for the increase in cost lies in the inflation which has occurred in the past 2 years.

In giving this statement on the background of the construction of a larger aircraft carrier, I hope that I have not renewed any of the antagonism which has heretofore existed because of this matter. There is no longer cause for controversy, since the construction of the proposed carrier now has the approval of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, and the President. So let us leave that controversy behind as we go forward in our preparations for national defense.

Now I want to call the committee's attention to section 4 of the bill. This section has not been previously submitted to any agency of the executive branch for approval. However, it represents the unanimous conviction of the members of the House Committee on Armed Services. You will note that it provides that no battleship, carrier, cruiser, destroyer, or submarine of the United States which has not been stricken from the Navy register, or any interest of the United States in any such vessel, shall hereafter be sold, transferred, or otherwise disposed of unless hereafter authorized by the Congress.

This action by the House Committee on Armed Services came about as the result of information which we received in local newspapers that a number of United States naval vessels were being sold to certain friendly countries in South America. We learned that the principal disposals consisted of two cruisers to Argentina, two cruisers to Brazil, and two cruisers to Chile. Further investigation revealed that these disposals were being made under the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended.

Section 408 (e) of that act, as amended, provides that the President may, from time to time, in the interest of achieving standardization of military equipment and in order to provide procurement assistance without cost to the United States, transfer, or enter into contracts for the procurement for transfer of, equipment, materials, or services to certain classes of friendly nations. The section further provides the manner in which the consideration for such transfer was to be determined. I do not deem the money consideration to be a very important factor. However, since the words "equipment, materials, or services," as used in the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, have been interpreted to include ships in the active fleet of the Navy, I deem it of the highest importance that we should take some immediate clarifying action. I do not know whether any Members of the House realized that our Government could dispose of almost anything it wished to, except merchant vessels, under the terms of that act. Neither the committee hearings nor the committee report clarify this point, as to ships, and I want to frankly admit that I did not have the slightest idea that combatant ships of the active fleet of the Navy could be disposed of under the terms of the act. During the entire period that I have been concerned with the affairs of the Navy, I have always insisted that all authorizations for naval ship construction contain a prohibition against the disposal of any such ship unless specifically authorized by the Congress. Those prohibitions which were written into previous ship authorization bills were nullified by the wording of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act. So the net effect of section 4 of the proposed legislation is to restore to the Congress the same rights which it has heretofore enjoyed in the disposal of combatant ships of the Navy.

I want to say that the intent of the House Committee on Armed Services, as expressed in section 4 of the proposed legislation, is not intended to cast the slightest reflection on anyone, either in or out of the Congress. Transfers which have already been effected under the act have all been made to friendly countries, and I am certain that they were made in the best of faith by all parties concerned. I do insist, however, that it is far more appropriate to have such matters considered by the Congress in the normal legislative manner when all of the facts are subjected to the light of public scrutiny. It is entirely possible that additional transfers may be made, but I am confident that all of you join me in the feeling that it is better to do it in a manner which experience has proved to be sound.

The total cost of the program contained in the proposed legislation is approximately $2,000,000,000, based upon current dollar value. The first increment of funds for this program will be contained in the Third Supplemental Appropriation Act. That is the best evidence that time is of the essence in this program.

With the exception of section 4, which I have just explained, the program has the approval of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, and the President—and is unanimously approved by the House Committee on Armed Services. I trust that this series of favorable actions will remove any doubts which may have existed in the minds of any members of this committee, and that you will forthwith approve this legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I notice section 4 of the proposed legislation provides that no battleship, carrier, cruiser, destroyer, or submarine of the United States which has not been stricken from the Navy register or any interest of the United States in any such vessel shall hereafter be sold, transferred, or otherwise disposed of, unless authorized hereafter by the Congress.

Mr. VINSON. I thought that I would first deal with the other sections and then take up section 4.

Mr. Chairman, I will yield to any Member for any question in regard to the construction program at this point. I feel that if the subject is developed in this way, it will enable us more intelligently to understand everything in the bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman advise the House and the country whether any effort has been made to obtain the return of some 500 vessels which I understand we loaned to Russia during World War II?

Has the Government asked Russia for the return of those vessels?

Mr. VINSON. I will say that all I know about it is what I have read in the newspapers. I do not know whether a formal request in diplomatic manner has been made by Russia to return any of the vessels that were given to her under lend-lease during the last war.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I understand the gentleman is going to touch on the whole subject later in his remarks.

Mr. VINSON. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the gentleman explain why it is that we justify an aircraft carrier at this time, in view of the controversy which preceded this authorization——

Mr. VINSON. All of you recall that some time in the fiscal 1949 the Appropriations Act made money available to commence the construction of a large airplane carrier which was to be of 65,000 tons. This carrier will be of 57,000 tons. That carrier was approved by the former Secretary of Defense, Mr. Forrestal. The House again made money available in the fiscal 1950 Appropriation Act. Then on April 23, 1949, Mr. Johnson canceled the contract after the keel had been laid. When that contract was canceled, the Government had to pay the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. $2,718,632 for the work that had been done up to the cancellation of the contract.

A controversy arose between the Department of the Air and of the Navy as to the carrier. The Armed Services Committee held long hearings in 1949, and the Armed Services Committee unanimously concluded that each military department should be permitted, authorized, and justified to determine what kind of weapons it needed to carry out its military missions. So after that conclusion on the part of the Armed Services Committee, a restudy was made of the advisability of building an airplane carrier larger than what is known as the Midway or Essex class. Modern naval aviation has so developed that it has need for a larger deck from which to fly. Now, if the committee will visualize, an airplane carrier is nothing more than a mobile, floating landing field. That is all it is. With the development of jet aviation, it became necessary to strengthen the decks of various airplane carriers. So we are already on a program to do that, enabling carriers to carry larger airplanes which have a greater flight radius.

This, therefore, caused the Department to conclude, and rightly so, that to carry on the steady progress of advancement in the art of aircraft you must have a larger deck from which to fly. So, therefore, they have recommended that we expand the airplane carrier into a larger class than that of the Midway type. That is what this bill does. It does not conflict in the slightest degree with the roles and missions of the Air Force. It may be possible, and in all probability will be possible, that the airplanes that fly off of the Midway and fly off of the Essex type, and fly off of this type of carrier will carry planes which can deliver the atomic bomb. Now, that is not an encroachment on the function of the Air Department. It is simply an addition to and an augmenting of the striking force of the Air Force.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think I am in full agreement with the gentleman, as most Members are, that we do need such a supercarrier.

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And as the gentleman recalls on the occasion last week when he submitted his consent request to bring this bill up I reminded him of the fact that we had appropriated in the past for one of these carriers and then that the will of the Congress had been thwarted and the carrier's construction had been canceled. I want to ask the gentleman this morning if there is any provision in this bill which would prevent the President or some new Secretary of National Defense whom he may decide to appoint in the future from deciding in his inordinate and great wisdom that the Congress did not know what they were doing and cancel the construction again after the ship is half built at the taxpayers' expense?

Mr. VINSON. There is nothing in this bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Does the gentleman think we should strengthen the bill by writing such a provision in it?

Mr. VINSON. No. I may say in this connection that I feel confident this ship will be built, for this reason: There is no controversy between the Navy and the Department of Air about it; it is approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff; it is recommended by the Secretary of National Defense, and approved by the President. All we are saying in this bill is that the President is authorized to do these things.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And the gentleman is absolutely convinced that the President will not change his mind?

Mr. VINSON. I am satisfied now that the ships referred to in this bill are going to be built, and we are asking for money in the third supplementary to commence them. We are going to get them under construction right away. Of course, the cancellation of the carrier cost about three million dollars.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It was not $20,000,000?

Mr. VINSON. No; the gentleman is in error; it was $2,718,000. The settlement was made with the Newport News Co. and closed out on the 21st of December 1950.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Then the information that the committee gave me was incorrect?

Mr. VINSON. The correct amount is $2,718,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman to yield just at this point for one further statement?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The House has great confidence in the distinguished gentleman from Georgia; we have followed his leadership on military and naval matters for a great many years. Can he assure the House that he personally will follow up on this matter and make sure that they do not decide to change their minds?

Mr. VINSON. I am satisfied that when we have a roll call here on this bill and when this bill, which involves an expenditure of some $2,000,000,000, is passed, there will be no hesitancy on the part of the Executive to carry out the wishes of the Congress as reflected in this bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And the gentleman's committee will do its usual good job of checking

Mr. VINSON. We will do our best.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Did I hear the gentleman correctly when I understood that he said that in 1949 it was decided that each department of the armed services would determine its own kind of weapons?

Mr. VINSON. That was the report of the Armed Services Committee growing out of the fact that we had a controversy between the Department of Air and the Department of the Navy. The Armed Services Committee unanimously reported, and rightly so, that each service should have the right to determine the type and character and the characteristics of the weapons it must use to meet its mission; that is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman want to leave it that way, that each service is the master of its own decision as to what type of weapon they shall have? What about the Joint Chiefs of Staff, if they should be in disagreement?

Mr. VINSON. I believe my statement is absolutely correct; at least, that is the way I want to leave it. But in my opinion the Joint Chiefs of Staff would be trespassing upon dangerous ground if when the Navy said they needed a certain type of submarine they said they could not have that type because the Joint Chiefs knew best. I think the Navy knows best the type of ship it needs; I think the Department of Air knows best what kind of planes it needs for strategic bombing; I think the Army knows best what kind of weapons it needs to use with its ground forces.

Mr. McCORMACK. And the gentleman leaves it that way, that each department determines its own weapons without regard to consultation or the views of the others?

Mr. VINSON. It may consult with them, but a wise Joint Chiefs of Staff would not override their decision. Each service must develop its own weapon. Then the Joint Weapons Systems Evaluation Board determines the capabilities by those weapons.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with that, but that is different from the gentleman's original statement. I am very much concerned if each department determines absolutely its own weapons.

Mr. VINSON. Each department must determine what kind of uniform it will have.

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, now, that is a different proposition.

Mr. VINSON. Each department must determine this, that, and the other thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree they should have original jurisdiction, but I am concerned with this absolutism.

Mr. VINSON. That was the conclusion of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. The Armed Services Committee does not leave it up to themselves. You disagree with the services, and you should.

Mr. VINSON. Yes; but we give weight to what the services say.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is different. It is entirely different giving weight than to have the right of absolute decision.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I must proceed because there are some other matters here I wish to deal with.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. At the outset of the gentleman's remarks he said the program would cost an estimated $1,000,000,000.

Mr. VINSON. The construction program will cost a billion dollars.

Mr. GROSS. Is it one or two?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Was there pointed out before the committee the issue of very large aircraft for strategic bombing as a mission versus the Navy undertaking this same mission?

Mr. VINSON. There is no duplication, as far as I know, of the types of airplanes that are going to be used on carriers, and those of the Air Force that are used for strategic bombing.

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman would then modify his answer by saying that the mission is to be determined by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. VINSON. The second phase of this bill deals with conversion. We propose to convert some 291 ships into various modifications. We are already converting certain airplane carriers. We propose to convert 6 of them; we propose to convert 12 cruisers, 2 guided missile cruisers, 194 destroyers, 12 radar picket destroyers, 31 landing craft, and 44 smaller vessels of various types. That conversion program involves ships that are taken out of mothballs, ships that are already in the fleet. They are making certain conversions. I cannot discuss the type of these conversions because that, in a great many instances, is secret. It will cost in the neighborhood of a billion dollars to convert these 291 ships.

Mr. Chairman, the next phase of the bill is a very important one. We wrote in this bill that no ships could be transferred without the permission of the Congress. I want to invite everyone's attention to this because I know every Member of Congress is deeply concerned about it.

That came about in this way: We read in the newspapers where two cruisers were going to be given to Argentina or sold to Argentina, two cruisers to Brazil, two cruisers to Chile, and then on January 15, two destroyers were transferred to Italy. We knew in times past that the old Naval Affairs Committee had written into every ship-construction bill a proviso that nothing built under that bill could be given away, transferred, or put under other flags except by direct permission of the Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I am concerned about is how anyone can give property of the United States away?

Mr. VINSON. I am going to tell the gentleman right now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree that the legislation should make sure they do not.

Mr. VINSON. I will tell the gentleman right now that this whole House sat here and permitted it to be done. Few, if any of us, knew anything about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, who slipped that over on the House?

Mr. VINSON. Well, listen to this: Let me read it so that the record will be straight. Section 408 of this act as amended provides:

Section 408 (e) (1): The President may, from time to time, in the interest of achieving standardization of military equipment and in order to provide procurement assistance without cost to the United States, transfer, or enter into contracts for the procurement for transfer of equipment, matériels—

Now, that was part of a section that was put in the bill that came out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as amended on July 25. That section authorized the President to transfer combatant vessels and many other things. I was dumfounded when I found out what was going on, and I said, "Why, you cannot do it." I said, "Where is your authority?" I said, "Mr. COLE and I for 20 years have been putting provisions like this in Navy ship authorization bills, and those ships cannot be transferred unless Congress says so." "Well," he said, "you are not familiar with the Mutual Defense Assistance Act." We then read the act, and we found that it gave the President the authority to transfer combatant ships of the Navy, but excluded commercial vessels. So, the sum and substance was that you cannot give away or you cannot sell any of these ships of the Maritime Commission; but, lo and behold, you can sell airplane carriers, battleships, cruisers, and all. So we wrote a provision in the bill that you could not do it until you got permission from the Congress. Now we have corrected it. It was all right, probably, for them to have done it, but let Congress do it instead of the departments.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to congratulate the gentleman on correcting this error, and I hope that he will be vigilant in the future to see that no one can give the Navy away.

Mr. VINSON. We will watch them, if you gentlemen will just back us up. In that connection, the other day when we had up the billion dollar construction bill we wrote a provision in there that all the real property that was acquired under that bill or any previous act for the Army, the Navy, or the Air Force could not be sold without permission of Congress. But, lo and behold, I saw in the RECORD this morning that the President has sent up a special message requesting the repeal of that provision. Of course, I hate to differ with the Commander in Chief, the Executive, but I think that when the Government acquires these military stations, or when the Government acquires these ships, Congress, speaking for the American people, are the ones to dispose of them, and not the Executive.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I want to say to the gentleman that he is entirely correct in the position he has taken. I want to ask him this question. Does his action in this bill, or the action of his committee in this bill correct the situation so that they cannot sell ships already built under the law; bills brought out by the Congress?

Mr. VINSON. Well, they have already made some transfers which are beyond recall. But if we are to make any more, let the executive department come here with a request as it did for Greece, and we will have a hearing and let the Congress determine.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Commercial ships can be transferred under the law.

Mr. VINSON. If you pass this bill, the Committee on Armed Services will get back in the saddle again.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I inquire of the gentleman whether or not he will instruct the counsel of the Committee on Armed Services to carefully check and read all bills that come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the future to be sure that none of us are caught in the future?

Mr. VINSON. I trust the gentleman from Ohio and all of us will be at least cautious and try to know what is in all of these bills, but it is impossible to do so. I am not criticizing them. It is probably all right. But we did not know it until 6 months later.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I know the gentleman wants to be fair with all the Members of the House, and with that in mind I want to remind him during the debate on the mutual assistance bill some of us pointed out that under the provisions of the mutual assistance bill the Government could give away anything belonging to the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, or the Marine Corps. Some of us voted against the bill, and were criticized for it.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is regrettable that the Congress today must consider in this legislation providing for construction of naval vessels the authorization of an airplane carrier.

I have no doubt in my mind as to the necessity for the carrier. Hearings before our committee have validated the necessity. It is ridiculous, however, to consider that a vessel of this type was authorized by the Eightieth Congress and the money appropriated for construction. A large carrier was then contemplated and the cost to the Government was much less. The order by the Department of Defense scuttling the carrier is an instance of the false economy often practiced by the military authorities. We now find that the carrier authorized in this bill is 8,000 tons less in weight yet costing forty-five millions more than the other. The cancellation order alone cost the taxpayers in the neighborhood of two millions. These amounts may be "small potatoes" to the present administration—but to individual citizens the sum is a considerable one.

Beyond the money consideration, we have the grave question as to time lost in preparing for proper defense. It may well be that the carrier authorized in this bill will not be constructed for use in the present emergency. Had the work gone ahead on the previous carrier as envisioned by the Republican Congress of 1947–48 the Navy would be better prepared to play its role in the preparedness program.

I well remember the administration ousting of Admiral Denfeld for his insistence upon going ahead with the proper naval program despite political expediency. This legislation is a vindication of the views he expressed at that time.

I shall support this authorization, but feel impelled to make known the background of fumbling and inconsistency on the part of the executive department. Day after day it becomes more evident that the Republican Congress elected in 1946 was of great service to our people.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words with respect to the pending bill.

This bill authorizes the construction of 500,000 tons of naval vessels and the conversion of 1,000,000 tons of existing vessels. The approximate cost of the program as proposed by the bill will be $2,000,000,000.

This is part of our national defense program. It is one of the many steps to be taken to meet the existing threat to our national security. Your Committee on Armed Services is determind that we have a strong, efficient, well-balanced defense establishment, that we be strong on land, in the air, and on the seas. In striving to attain this objective at the earliest possible date, for time is of the essence, those of us who serve on the Committee on Armed Services have not, and will not, permit any partisan or political considerations to influence our decisions.

The bill we have before us today was reported to you unanimously. I hope that it will pass this House unanimously.

During this session we will be called upon to consider many more bills pertaining to our national defense. No one expects that there will be unanimous agreement, in committee or in the House as a whole, on each and every one of them. Each of us may have his opinion as to what should or should not be done for building up the proper kind of a defense. The mere fact that some one of us may not agree with what is recommended, whether by the administration or by our committee, and has the courage to express his disagreement as he should, does not mean that he is against our achieving a strong national defense.

It must be understood that there can be honest differences of opinion on defense measures. Unity of purpose does not require that we refrain from expressing these differences.

I have taken the time to stress this fact because too many people, some occupying high places of leadership, promptly question the motives of anyone who may disagree. One who may honestly disagree is invariably accused of playing politics or partisanship if he should be of a different political party affiliation. There is altogether too much of this questioning of motives and name-calling.

We have had our differences in the Armed Services Committee. But I am pleased to say that not once have the motives, the good faith, or honest purpose of a single member of the committee ever been questioned. I hope that in this same spirit each and every defense bill that comes before us will be debated on the floor of the House.

The point which I believe should be emphasized in connection with the pending bill is that by this program we seek to build up the naval offensive power. You will note that the bill authorizes the construction of a new aircraft carrier of approximately 57,000 tons. It will take about 3½ years to build this carrier.

Prior to the Korean conflict we had the tragic experience of having construction stopped on a supercarrier which the Congress authorized and for which we appropriated funds. We also had the tragic experience of seeing our naval air arm drastically reduced. What was once the greatest naval power in the world was practically scuttled. The Marine Corps in June of last year, when we entered the Korean War, had been whittled down to only 74,000 men, as compared to 472,000 in September of 1945.

In other words, the administration had virtually destroyed the offensive power of our Navy. Our Committee on Armed Services has been endeavoring to correct this tragic mistake. We now realize how much damage the faulty policies followed by our national leaders has done to our state of preparedness. And we are indeed paying a dear price for these inexcusable errors.

You will also recall that in the Eightieth Congress we initiated a program for a 70-group Air Force. We appropriated funds to carry out the program, but the money we appropriated was impounded.

The point I wish to emphasize is that our present state of unpreparedness is not the fault of our Committee on Armed Services, nor of the Congress. It is the fault of those in charge of our national defense. They refused to carry out the wishes of the Congress.

And there is this further point I wish to emphasize: Whatever the President may conceive to be his duties and responsibilities as Commander in Chief, the primary responsibility for our national defense rests with the Congress. We are the representatives of the people. We decide the size, nature, and character of the defense we shall have. When we make that decision it is the duty of the President to see that it is carried out.

When we pass this bill to carry out a certain naval-construction program, and we appropriate funds for that purpose, it becomes the duty of the Executive to see that the will of the Congress is fulfilled. We will cooperate with the Executive for seeing that we have a strong national defense, and we have the right to expect that he will cooperate with us. That is the only possible way that unity can be attained in meeting the difficult problems now confronting us.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I arise to support this legislation which is designed to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels, for the conversion of existing vessels, and for other purposes. One of the vessels to be constructed is a 57,000-ton carrier for the United States Navy.

I would like to use the time allotted to me to discuss the arbitrary cancellation on April 23, 1949, of the 65,000-ton carrier, the U. S. S. United States, by the then Secretary of Defense after the Congress of the United States had not only authorized its construction but had actually appropriated the money.

It is not my intention to revive any old controversies, but to review what took place and to point out that the will of Congress was completely ignored when the construction of the carrier was canceled.

Briefly, here is the situation.

Carrying out his responsibility and after an intensive study based on years of experience with carrier-based aviation, the Chief of Naval Operations, speaking for the Navy Department, proposed a 65,000-ton carrier. It was not a super carrier as some tagged it, but a logical development of an existing one.

The recommendation to build the U. S. S. United States was concurred in by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, the Bureau of the Budget, the Congress, and by the President of the United States.

The difference in size between the proposed 65,000-ton U. S. S. United States and the 45,000-ton Midway-class carrier was that the United States would have been 1,090 feet in length and 135 feet in width compared with the Midway class of 990 feet in length and 105 feet wide. In other words, the United States would have been 100 feet longer and 30 feet wider.

With a flush deck and little or no superstructure the 65,000-ton U. S. S. United States would have permitted various types of planes, some equipped to carry A-weapons to fly 1,700 miles out and 1,700 miles back whereas the planes of our existing carriers had a range of around a thousand miles.

The cost of the United States was estimated at $189,000,000, and at the time of its cancellation the keel had actually been laid and the ship was under construction at the Newport News shipyards, Newport News, Va. In addition, at least a half dozen special types of aircraft to operate from the United States were under construction in the plants of several aircraft manufacturers.

At that time the Navy Department had obligated itself in the form of intent to contractors in the amount of $150,000,000 and spent $7,500,000 in cash. The shipbuilder had contracted for between 90 and 100 thousand tons of steel, all of which had been fabricated and 3,000 tons of it had been delivered. Commitments had been made by the Newport News shipyards to contractors for boilers, auxiliaries, and so forth, in the amount of $10,000,000. Ordnance in the amount of $3,000,000 had been contracted for by the Navy Department, while several additional millions of dollars were tied up in the initial cost of new types of aircraft. Thousands of man-hours had been expended by officers and civilians of the Navy Department, not to forget travel expenditures, and so forth.

As the result of the cancellation of the carrier, the taxpayers of this country suffered the following estimated loss:

(a) Nearly $20,000,000 in material and labor.

(b) Another $45,000,000 in construction costs when taking into consideration the higher cost of materials today needed to build the new 57,000-ton carrier which will cost about $235,000,000.

(c) Two and one-half to three years in time from the standpoint of having the carrier available for immediate use.

Laying aside for the moment the loss in money, materials, time, and labor, the American people were stunned in the spring of 1949 when they learned that the Secretary of Defense had acted without consulting the Congress, the Secretary of the Navy, or the Chief of Naval Operations in canceling the carrier.

At this point I want to insert for the RECORD, the letter written by Secretary of the Navy John Sullivan to the Secretary of Defense dated April 26, 1949, together with another letter to the President on the same date tendering his resignation as Secretary of the Navy.

Time will not permit me to read these letters, but I hope that every Member of Congress will refresh his memory as to what actually took place and which resulted in the resignation of a very popular and able Secretary of the Navy, John L. Sullivan.

APRIL 26, 1949.

Hon. LOUIS JOHNSON,
The Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On Saturday, April 23, without discussion with the Chief of Naval Operations, without consultation with the Secretary of the Navy, you directed the discontinuance of the construction of the U. S. S. United States, the construction of which had twice been approved by the President.

This carrier had been the subject of intensive study in the Navy Department since it was first proposed early in 1945 by the late Admiral Marc A. Mitscher whose combat experience had convinced him of its necessity. In a hearing with the Director of the Budget on December 16, 1947, with the approval of the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of the Bureau of Ships, I volunteered to surrender $307,000,000 which was the cost to complete the approved construction of other vessels, to insure that funds would be available for the U. S. S. United States. Its construction was explicitly approved by the reports of the Armed Services Committees of the Senate and House on June 2, 1948, and June 9, 1948, respectively. In the Naval Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1949 the appropriation for the first year of construction of the U. S. S. United States was approved by the Congress. Again on December 17, 1948, in a conference with the Secretary of Defense and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, with the approval of the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of the Bureau of Ships, I abandoned construction of other vessels in the amount of $57,000,000 to insure the continuance of the carrier and other vessels. Additional funds for the continuing construction of this vessel in the fiscal year 1950 were included in the budget message which the President sent to the Congress on January 3, 1949, and were included in the National Military Establishment appropriation bill passed by the House on April 13, 1949.

Professional Navy men, charged with the task of planning for a navy adequate to the defense of America believe that the construction of the U. S. S. United States is so indispensable to the continuing development of American sea power that they have twice sacrificed other substantial construction because of the carrier's highest naval priority.

On Monday, April 18, while discussing a variety of subjects with you, the question of the continuance of work on the U. S. S. United States was raised, and my opinion was asked. I started to give my opinion, but before I had talked more than a minute you advised me that you had another appointment and would discuss this matter with me at a later date. The following day I sent you a very brief memorandum touching on only one phase of the justification of this carrier. In this memorandum I referred to my desire to resume the discussions that had been interrupted the previous day.

I heard nothing about this again until Saturday, April 23, when in Corpus Christi, Tex., I was advised by long distance telephone that you had sent me a memorandum directing the discontinuance of construction.

I am, of course, very deeply disturbed by your action which so far as I know represents the first attempt ever made in this country to prevent the development of a powerful weapon. The conviction that this will result in a renewed effort to abolish the Marine Corps and to transfer all naval and marine aviation elsewhere adds to my anxiety.

However, even of greater significance is the unprecedented action on the part of a Secretary of Defense in so drastically and arbitrarily changing and restricting the operational plans of an armed service without consultation with that service. The consequences of such a procedure are far-reaching and can be tragic.

In view of the foregoing I am sure you will agree with me that no useful purpose can now be served by my remaining as Secretary of the Navy. I have accordingly submitted my resignation to the President.

I deeply regret the circumstances that lead to my departure from the National Military Establishment at such an interesting and crucial period of its development.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

APRIL 26, 1949.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is with profound regret that I submit to you my resignation as Secretary of the Navy, effective at the earliest date convenient to you.

It is almost 4 years since you called me back into Federal service. For the three appointments you have conferred upon me and, even more, for the day-to-day consideration, kindness, and friendliness you have manifested toward me, I shall always be grateful.

I send you my very best wishes for your continuing good health and the success of your administration. More deeply than words can express, I regret the circumstances that prevent me from continuing in my present post to help you in your magnificent efforts.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN L. SULLIVAN.

I am sure that the average person will agree that while the time and money lost in the scrapping of the carrier United States in a series of blunders that cannot be redeemed, there is none of us that will ignore that it was not the halting of the work on the carrier, but the basic principle, that was at stake. The principle is simply that by a stroke of the pen the Secretary of Defense ignored the wishes of Congress, who represents the American people, and thus weakened the defenses of the United States.

Since Korea events prove many of the arbitrary decisions by the Secretary of Defense similar to the cancellation of the carrier United States were made in defiance of the statutes of Congress and without doubt tended to weaken the defenses of this Nation.

I may add that the 57,000-ton carrier contained in the bill before us—yes; even all the ships provided for in this legislation—could be canceled by the present Secretary of Defense in the same manner as by his predecessor.

As I said in the beginning of my statement, it is not my intention to revive old controversies, but in my opinion as we approve this bill that provides for the construction of a 57,000-ton carrier, we should keep in mind the cancellation of the carrier United States by the arbitrary action of the Secretary of Defense in the spring of 1949. With this experience in mind, we should proceed immediately to amend the Unification Act so that the will of the Congress cannot be ignored. After all, we are the elected representatives of the people and charged with the responsibility of providing this Nation with an adequate national defense.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is one to enlarge the Navy, and a part of that Navy will be used in the Mediterranean. In fact, some units of our Navy are there now and have been for a number of years.

What I wish to talk to you about today during this 5 minutes is the incidental problem of trying to make some arrangement with Spain to get American bases in that area.

Last summer it was my privilege to go to Europe, under the direction of our chairman, to study the military defense assistance program. I think the program is sound, and if we do not overdraw manpower from America, it is a very good way to protect ourselves. It is much better to fight our battle for freedom on the perimeter of freedom than on the Atlantic coast, in the event another great war should befall the earth.

I went out of my way to go down to Spain to see what the obstacle was preventing cooperation between our country and Spain in the particular critical situation that we find ourselves today. I found that the main trouble at that time was that we did not have an ambassador to Spain, and therefore there was no man of sufficiently high rank to talk to Franco, the head man of Spain. I understand that we have corrected that situation. We are going to have an ambassador to that country. But here we have the same sort of objections and arbitrary conduct by a statement of the President that, irrespective of whether we have an ambassador, there will be no dealings with Spain in relation to the military defense assistance program in Europe, which we are now trying to implement.

The last Congress of the United States appropriated $62,500,000 for the purpose of aiding Spain. It was only a loan. It will be guaranteed so we will recover every dollar. Why we should turn down a chance to work with that country is more than I can understand. Everyone here knows that there is not a single piece of land in the entire world today, in the light of the modern situation and the terrible thing facing the world, that is more important to the security of the world than the Iberian Peninsula. Spain is the most strategic piece of property in the entire world today. From there, if we had bases we could fan out with our aircraft over all of industrial Europe almost to the Arctic Circle; we could fly out over the Mediterranean where we have friends around the entire basin, except Albania, and perhaps Spain—and we want to make the Spaniards our friends—we could patrol and protect North Africa, we could dominate the great Arabian oil fields in every way. For the security of ourselves and posterity we ought to find some way to work with Spain.

They are anxious to work with us. I had the pleasure of talking with what they call the grand staff of the army in Spain and I found them anxious to cooperate with America. The ranking Republican member of our committee went to Europe several years ago. He also visited Spain and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] wrote a very wonderful and convincing article showing the tremendous advantages that we could have by cooperating with this country. This article was published in the Reader's Digest. The bugbear to our cooperation with Spain seems to be that their social system and their political system are not like ours. There is not a Member of Congress who believes in their social system; there is not a Member of Congress who believes in their governmental system; but for goodness' sake, if they can help us in the distress in which we find ourselves, we ought to accept their help. The very fact of having troops in the area and the spending of American money might help their poverty. That is only an incidental matter and we would not want to do it for that purpose alone, but we should make friends and have a space to locate air, Army, and naval bases. The Pyrenees are a barricade in which a very small army in numbers could withstand the onslaught of an army 10 times as big coming from the north or from the east.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is it conceivable to the gentleman that we might be able to cooperate with Tito and then refuse cooperation with Franco?

Mr. JOHNSON. I was coming to that point. We have worked with the Soviets; we have worked with Tito; Portugal, which signed the Atlantic Pact has a dictator; yet in Spain, for some reason, in the area which means most for our security and for the protection of our children, we just coldly turn our backs to those people. Every Member of Congress that I know who has visited Spain believes as I do, that we should have a working agreement with Spain. At this time we can ill afford to turn a cold shoulder to a country of 22,000,000 people who could be so helpful to us, if the military storm should break over Europe.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at long last we can rejoice that this Government is beginning to exercise a little hard common sense by sending an ambassador to Madrid.

I did write an article for the Reader's Digest about 2 years ago which also was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 26, 1949, pointing out the great advantages it would be to us from a strategic and military point of view to recognize Spain and deal with her. I think any military man will tell you whether he is in the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, or the Air Force, that from a strategic and military point of vantage there is no spot more valuable to the United States, so far as helping continental Europe is concerned, than the Iberian Peninsula. It is not only a beachhead affording us excellent airdromes, but it is also a barrier due to the fact that the Pyrenees Mountains are almost impassable. By aiding Greece and Turkey we protect the east Mediterranean and keep open Suez Canal. By helping Spain we protect the west Mediterranean and keep open the Strait of Gibraltar. One is rather useless without the other.

We must also bear in mind that there is perhaps no country on earth that is more anti-Communist than Spain, or which would contribute more to the stability of present-day Europe than that proud country. Furthermore, Spain has minerals and raw materials that we sorely need.

One does not, Mr. Chairman, have to sanction the political, social, or economic system of any country before recognizing it. In fact, we are dealing now with Soviet Russia. We recognize Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and many of the other nations back of the iron curtain. Certainly we have more in common with Spain than we have with these satellite Communist countries. When we recognize these countries we do so because they have a stable form of government and regardless of what one might think of the Franco regime you will have to admit that it has brought order and stability out of chaos. Do not overlook the fact that they have between 400,000 and 500,000 fighting men. In my honest and humble opinion Spain is the one nation in Western Europe we could depend upon and rest assured would fight in case of a global conflict.

Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I now want to add a few more observations or views to those I have expressed. My only reason for mentioning Spain is that my able colleague and very dear friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON] a member of the Armed Services Committee, brought up the matter. It may be a bit extraneous to this particular debate on this specific bill, but it certainly is most worthy of consideration.

Because of our limited debate I have yielded most of our time to other Members who desired to speak on the legislation now under consideration.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] stated a moment ago that aircraft carriers are very vulnerable. Of course, every weapon of war is vulnerable, but the truth of the matter is, not one single major aircraft carrier in World War II was sunk by submarines, aircraft, or any other weapon. Pray tell me, sir, where would we have been in World War II in our long trek from Guadalcanal, Leyte, Guam, Tinian, Saipan, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa to Tokio without our aircraft carriers?

The Pacific Ocean is a very big pond, and only those of us who have flown over it or sailed over it will appreciate the vast distances and the complex and difficult problems which that ocean offers. It was our aircraft carriers, supported by battleships, cruisers, destroyers, minesweepers and escort vessels that brought about victory to us in the Pacific war.

Recent events in Korea prove more than ever before the necessity for aircraft carriers capable of mobility and surprise attack. The function of carriers is to gain and retain complete control of the seas. It is to attack enemy shipping and to prevent the delivery of weapons, most of all oil, to supply the enemy. At the same time it is to make possible the delivery of all these supplies to our ground forces in foreign and distant lands and to supply our Air Force on land based fields. Never was a strong and versatile Navy so much needed as in modern mechanized warfare.

We all know that we must have a well balanced defense force. We cannot get along without any branch of our armed services. We must have a fighting team on land, sea, and in the air. Each branch of the service is indispensable for our own survival. Certainly, I would not minimize the necessity of having all three branches of our services built to their maximum strength.

This is no time for petty jealousies, nasty bickerings, and destructive recriminations but it is pleasing and reassuring to know that the Navy was not "sunk" and that the Marine Corps was not "liquidated" as some bitter partisans would have done as late as October 1949.

Naturally, all branches of the services should be represented on the Joint Chiefs of Staff but we do not want a land-locked psychology to determine the course that we shall pursue. I would not want the Navy and the Air Force to tell the Army that it should not build a bigger and better tank than the Sherman or the improved Patton. I would not want the Navy and the Army to tell the Air Force that it could not build a bigger and better plane than the B–29, the B–36, or the B–47. Likewise, I do not want the Air Force and the Army to tell the Navy that it cannot build a bigger and better carrier than the Midway or Essex type.

Mr. Chairman, the improvement and development of all the weapons of war from the super-bomber, super-carrier, the Garand rifle, the snorkel submarine, the improved radio and radar equipment, guided missiles, rocketfire, the atom bomb, bacteriological warfare, and perhaps the hydrogen bomb under development, must go on. It must not be forgotten that our improved aircraft in World War II on the drawing board at the time of Pearl Harbor, never actually got into combat before the close of World War II.

In this age of scientific research and technological development the weapons of war like the automobile, radio, and television become obsolete almost overnight.

For the benefit of Members, and specially the new Members, I would like to give briefly the background of the battle for the larger and more effective aircraft carrier.

During the late phases of the Pacific war, carrier task force commanders reported an ever-increasing need for larger, heavier, carrier-based aircraft to accomplish war missions. To accommodate these larger aircraft, they strongly recommended construction of an aircraft carrier larger than either the 27,000-ton Essex class or the 45,000-ton Midway class carriers.

Studies of the need for such a carrier were originally instituted in the Navy Department by the late Admiral Marc Mitscher, commander of the famed Task Force 58. Construction of a 65,000-ton flush deck aircraft carrier was approved by the Navy Department for planning purposes in January 1946.

By October 1947, detailed designs and plans became sufficiently firm to justify a budget request for the construction of this carrier. Such a request was accordingly submitted in the Navy's budget for 1949. The budget request was approved by the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Defense, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and by the President, and funds to undertake construction of the carrier were contained in the Department of the Navy Appropriation Act, 1949.

The contract for the construction of the 65,000-ton carrier United States was awarded to the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Co., on August 10, 1948. The keel was laid at Newport News on April 18, 1949. Construction of the carrier was cancelled by the Secretary of Defense on April 23, 1949. At the time of cancellation, the estimated cost of constructing the United States was $189,000,000. The termination settlement agreement between the Government and the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Co., was concluded on December 21, 1950, at a cost to the Government of $2,718,672.12.

In addition to congressional approval of this carrier in the Naval Appropriation Act of 1949, it had congressional authorization through the enactment of H. R. 6049, Eightieth Congress, which bill was reported by the House Committee on Armed Services and subsequently passed by both the House and the Senate. The 1950 Appropriation Act carried an additional increment of funds for the construction of this large carrier which had already been started. This constituted the third approval of this carrier by the House of Representatives. It is pertinent to note that the House Armed Services Committee in its report of March 1, 1950, on unification and strategy, took the position that—

> In the case of the modern aircraft carrier and its relation to seapower, those best qualified to pass judgment are very evidently our Nation's professional Navy leaders.

The Navy leaders, of course, were unanimous in their approval of a large carrier.

The large carrier proposed in H. R. 1001 is a further development of the Midway class. It will be of approximately 57,000 standard displacement tons and of flush deck design. It is intended as a base from which modern carrier aircraft may be operated. The Navy points out that it is not a revolutionary weapon, but it is an improved conventional carrier into which the lessons of World War II and thereafter will be built. The ship will have increased catapult and arresting capacity, larger elevators and higher hangar decks overhead in order to accommodate larger and faster planes. There will be added armor protection and improved underwater protection. Fire fighting and electronic capabilities will be improved. The construction of this ship will not render the Midway type or the modernized Essex type obsolete. Its construction will place the Navy in a position of having at least a prototype for the test and operation of any carrier planes, the development of which may now reasonably be foreseen. The cost, under existing conditions, is estimated to be approximately $200,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those of us on the Armed Services Committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, welcome the most careful scrutiny, thorough examination, and any criticism that might be offered by any Member on this body. We do not claim to possess all wisdom and virtue and we know that other Members of this House are just as patriotic and concerned over the welfare of our Nation as are members of the Armed Services Committee.

Most assuredly I share the grave concern expressed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] over these vast expenditures even for our Armed Forces. Planes, carriers, submarines, and all the weapons of war are not the only phase of our national defense. Often I have said and I repeat it now: That the first line of defense of any nation is its financial solvency, a sound economy, and a productive industry. There is, of course, a limit to what an individual or a nation might do—but let me say to the gentlemen from Indiana and New York that this bill was not hastily considered and that our report is anything but scanty. This matter was considered thoroughly, after long, exhausive hearings in the Eightieth Congress which both the hearings and the report of our committee will show. It is painful to all of us to vote for a bill that calls for an expenditure of approximately $2,000,000,000 to build up our Navy, but there is no alternative.

Because of our geographical position, recent events, and the painful experience that we have gained in combat, I believe that any fair-minded, informed, and intelligent person will agree that we must at all times maintain a superior Navy. Without it the other two branches of our services will be impotent, and I trust that some men in high places in the Pentagon now realize it. None of us is infallible.

Mr. Chairman, recently on our retreat—or withdrawal—if that is a more comforting term—from the Chongjin Reservoir in North Korea, the Seventh United States Infantry Division on the east and the First United States Marine Division on the west marched from Hagaru and Koto down to Hamhung and then to Hungnam. Pray tell me, sir, where would we have been then without the United States Navy? Scores of naval craft of every description were out in that harbor and due to the support of the Third Infantry Division our fleet—because of its mighty fire power, was able to evacuate 105,000 United Nations' troops—mostly American, of course—and more than 95,000 Korean civilians. Without our Navy that would have been a mass massacre—the most devastating and ignominious defeat in all our history. We accomplished almost the impossible. Without detracting one bit from the splendid job done by our Air Force in that maneuver, I think most informed men will agree that it was the tactical support offered by carrier-based planes that saved the day—not only at Hungnam but also at Inchon.

Now, our forces evacuated from North Korea, have joined the southern forces in the Pusan area. Bitter fighting is now going on in the vicinity of Wonson, north of Pusan and southeast of Seoul.

None of us should be too critical about the reverses we have suffered, and far be it from me to assess the blame upon any particular individual or branch of our services. I would be the last person to want us to surrender. Certainly, I do not believe in capitulation, but when it comes to evacuation or annihilation, I shall choose evacuation. We can lose a battle without losing a war. This whole Korean campaign is an ill-fated one, as much as that of Gallipoli in World War I—the biggest mistake Winston Churchill ever made—and I still consider him the greatest man of our century.

Whether or not we shall remain in Korea will be largely determined by Stalin and Mao. It may be that we are driven out of Korea, but that does not spell defeat for us. We should draw a hard and fast line from Japan through Okinawa, Formosa, to the Philippines, and put forth all our strength to hold it. However, I am not the expert to make the decision.

Mr. Chairman, let us serve notice upon Russia, Red China, and the whole world that much as we might differ in the United States upon various issues, we are, after all, one people with one language and one interest. We have no desire to annex an acre of territory or to collect a dollar of indemnity. We will, as we have in the past, continue to help to the best of our ability, all those people in distress and those less fortunate than ourselves. We shall carry on in spite of all hardships and through every diversity to fight, and if need be die, in order that a just and lasting peace might be established and that all men everywhere shall enjoy the blessings of freedom and opportunity such as we have happily enjoyed in the United States of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, it was originally my intention to offer an amendment to this bill providing that the new 57,500-ton aircraft carrier be named the U. S. S. Forrestal; however, there is some question about the germaneness of such an amendment to this bill. Perhaps we would be setting a bad precedent by naming naval vessels on the floor of the House. I have introduced a joint resolution providing that this new carrier be named the U. S. S. Forrestal, a fitting tribute, in my opinion, to a great American, a great patriot, a man who gave his life for his country.

When the resolution comes back from the Department I trust that the Armed Services Committee and the House of Representatives will join me in paying this fine tribute to former Secretary of Defense Forrestal.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, present world conditions make it imperative that our Navy shall be built up to meet any emergency that presents itself. We cannot delay this important matter any longer. To do so is to take chances that may prove disastrous. Our national security should take precedence over any other Government activity. The Committee on Armed Services, under the able leadership of its chairman, CARL VINSON, of Georgia, and with the full cooperation of the ranking Republican member, DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, is to be congratulated that it recognizes the necessity of providing new construction and modernization of existing ships to meet any challenge we may be called upon to face.

The bill, H R. 1001, reported by the Armed Services Committee, and now before us for consideration, provides a construction program for the remainder of fiscal 1951 and for fiscal 1952 consisting of 173 new ships and 291 conversions. Each particular ship or type of ship is important primarily insofar as it contributes to a balance within the fleet in which it is intended to serve.

The bill involves an authorization to construct 500,000 tons of new naval vessels and to convert 1,000,000 tons of existing vessels. The construction program includes, as previously stated, 173 new vessels, as follows: 1 aircraft carrier of approximately 57,000 tons; 22 mine sweepers, 30 mine sweeper boats; 7 submarines; 2 ocean escorts; 12 fleet tankers; 2 rocket ships; 1 ice breaker; 66 landing ships; and 30 smaller vessels of various types. It is estimated that it will require 3½ years to complete the proposed aircraft carrier and that the remainder of the program can be completed in a period of 2 years.

The conversion program to modernize 291 presently existing vessels includes the following: 6 Essex-type carriers to accommodate improved jet aircraft; 12 cruisers, 2 guided-missile carriers, 194 destroyers, 12 radar picket destroyers, 31 landing craft, and 34 smaller vessels of various types.

The program will cost approximately $2,000,000,000 and is made necessary if our fleet is to be brought up to that state of efficiency that present improved methods of warfare require.

It is also appropriate to mention and emphasize that the proposed construction and modernization program will go far in stabilizing and restoring the shipbuilding industry. As I have heretofore pointed out on many occasions, the countenance of this industry in a strong, healthy condition is absolutely necessary as an arm of our national defense. Too often, through the years, it has been permitted to develop into a "feast or famine" existence. If the industry is to remain strong and be a constant source of strength, then the working organization must be kept together. Without work the workers must necessarily find other means of employment. It is, therefore, imperative that continuity of work be provided or the industry languishes into a state of weakness and unpreparedness for any emergency that may suddenly arise. This program presented by the Armed Services Committee will go far in strengthening our Navy and reviving our shipbuilding industry that has been fast dwindling into a state of weakness due to lack of work. I trust the bill will have unanimous support of the Congress.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, the 3,000-year-old tactics of Cyrus, of Attila, and of Genghis Khan have been employed to advantage by the Chinese Reds against the 150,000 Americans and their 25,000 United Nations allies in Korea. The Mongol horsemen have hit and run with singular efficiency against our extended lines of communication.

Horses gave the enemy forces speed and mobility where our highly mechanized troops were bogged down in snow and ice. The hardy ponies of the Chinese Reds were not halted by snow-clogged mountain passes. In fact, both weather and terrain fought with them, rather than against them.

The only military strategy which could have checkmated such strategy under such conditions would have been more and better horses and horsemen. The military axiom of that great southern battlemaster, Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest still holds true, "Get there fustest with the mostest."

The United States once was the greatest cavalry nation in all history. Nebraska boys, Georgia boys, Wyoming boys, Texas boys, learned to ride almost as soon as they learned to walk. From Rough Rider "Teddy" Roosevelt back through Jeb Stuart, "Swamp Fox" Francis Marion and "Light Horse Harry" Lee there had been heroes on horseback. Then what happened? At the end of World War II, with the atom bomb in sight, our cavalry was put out of business. It joined American economy as a historical curiosity.

Let us act before it is too late. Let us be ready—not for just one set of emergencies—but for all emergencies. In the defense bill, soon to come before this House, it is our duty as Americans to provide a place—an honored place—for that organization which has so valiantly and so successfully defended the lives and liberties of generations of our countrymen, the United States Cavalry.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER].

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is well to bring out in this debate that the program we are now asked to endorse is, in part at least, the same naval preparedness program ordered by the Republican Eightieth Congress, which was subsequently cut back by executive order on recommendation by Louis Johnson, when he was Secretary of Defense.

Mr. Johnson, in what has proven a very unwise economy move, cancelled out the supercarrier authorized in this bill along with many other naval projects contained herein. In a so-called economy program, which he insisted upon, Secretary Johnson cancelled out this carrier along with a congressional program of a 70-group Air Force and other defense projects which Congress voted.

For the benefit of the new Members of this Eighty-second Congress, there is nothing new in the present program. It was authorized by the Republican Eightieth Congress which, in spite of misrepresentations of the 1948 presidential campaign oratory, had voted.

This naval expansion program should have the support of every Member of the Congress. It is a program that would have been well under way to completion today if it had not been for the shortsightedness of the politically minded appointees of the Truman administration 2, 3, and 4 years ago.

Shades of Admiral Denfeld. Remember it was he who was fired as chief of naval operations because he told Congress, in the so-called B-36 hearings, that we should always maintain a great and powerful Navy.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL].

FLOODS AND THE WAR EFFORT

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, recent floods in the great Central Valley of California have caused the people of that area to be even more concerned than ever before with the rapid completion of flood control projects.

I am sure that a knowledge of the facts will convince both Chambers of the Congress that the earliest possible completion of the presently authorized flood-control projects in that area is necessary and urgent in the light of national defense. I am sure the Members will also be inclined to give special consideration to those projects which have been long authorized, but whose delay has been the result of an attempt to grant a small portion of available money to projects scattered all over 30 States and Alaska.

The new population going to California has relied upon the recommendations of the Army engineers and estimated early completion dates. Thousands of families have settled and invested their life savings on small farms in areas threatened with flood. It seems unbelievable to the people of California living in these areas threatened with flood that the first flood-control project to control the streams of this Nation was recommended for that area by the Corps of Army Engineers as early as 1913 and is still uncompleted.

One month after I entered upon my duties as Congressman for the Tenth District of California, in February 1949, I appeared before the Appropriations Committees of this Chamber of the Congress in support of flood control in California. They had recommended sufficient funds to complete flood control facilities on four rivers in the southern end of the San Joaquin Valley. At that time, I stated as follows:

The Tenth Congressional District of California, which I represent, embraces all of Kern, Kings, and Tulare Counties, the greater portion of which counties lies within the territory to be served by the Central Valley project, and the south 125 miles of the San Joaquin Valley lies within the Tenth Congressional District.

Those three counties now have a population of about 450,000, which is almost double the population of the same area 10 years ago. The area has over 14,000 farms, consisting of approximately 1,000,000 acres of harvested cropland, with an investment in farm land and buildings of over $200,000,000. The basic economy of the area is agriculture, where over 200 different crops are produced commercially. This cropland is now irrigated in some instances by diverting water from valley streams, but in most cases by pumping water from underground supplies. The tremendous burden placed on the area during the war for increase in production of agricultural crops to feed our allies, as well as ourselves, resulted in an increased area being placed under cultivation and intense cultivation of the land already farmed. Prewar water deficiency has been aggravated by the increased cultivation, together with a tremendous population growth. The water table is falling rapidly, so that the farmers must continually deepen their wells and use heavier pumping equipment.

The above-mentioned facts in connection with the San Joaquin Valley have been known for many years, and the Central Valley project was conceived to furnish supplemental water. The people in the area had high hopes when the Friant Dam was commenced on the San Joaquin River in November of 1939 that the water supply would be supplemented within a year or two. Today, 10 years after the Friant Dam was started, the area has received no additional water from the project except for a small area in Madera County.

The water shortage in the area makes the farmers' position critical.

The present status of the project is as follows:

Friant Dam, 98 percent complete.
Madera canal, 100 percent complete.
Shasta Dam, 99 percent complete.
Friant-Kern canal, 43 percent complete.
Delta Mendota canal, 20 percent complete.
Tracy pumping plant, 12 percent complete.

The Friant-Kern canal, the Delta Mendota canal, and the Tracy pumping plant should be completed at the earliest possible date in order that our farmers may receive the real benefits of water in the Friant-Kern canal.

The Delta Mendota canal and the Tracy pumping plant must be completed before a large part of the water to be used in the Friant-Kern canal may be diverted from the San Joaquin River.

I, therefore, want to emphasize the importance of using all appropriations possible in the Central Valley project for the completion of the said Friant-Kern canal, the Delta Mendota canal, and the Tracy pumping plant, and that the total appropriation be not less than a sum sufficient to complete these canals and pumps in the fiscal year 1950. This will require $40,000,000 for the Delta Mendota canal and Tracy pumping plant, and $21,000,000 for the completion of the Friant-Kern canal. I assure you that every person in the district desires the earliest possible completion date of the water facilities in connection with the Central Valley project, so that the real benefits of that project will not be denied to farmers who so urgently need the water. I sincerely believe that the people of the area are entitled to know that appropriations in connection with the above mentioned three vital parts of the Central Valley project will not be delayed for another period of years.

It is my understanding that the engineering studies for the canals mentioned have been completed and that it is possible, if the amount of money necessary were appropriated for these two canals and pumping system, that contracts could be awarded along the whole canal to different contractors, so that the work could be carried on simultaneously over the entire length of the canals.

An additional $12,000,000 should be designated for completion of the Delta cross channel, which is required to bring the water released from Shasta Dam to pumps at Tracy. It will be necessary that that channel be completed so that Sacramento River water may be pumped into the Mendota area so that the water may be diverted from the San Joaquin River into the Friant-Kern canal. This matter should also be completed in the year 1950. It seems a bit ridiculous to those of us in the area that the Friant and Shasta Dams, which have been practically completed for over 5 years, have been giving no practical benefit to water users as evidence of Government inefficiency. The real need in the area is water and the appropriations possible this year should be confined to the completion of the above mentioned units of the project.

To accomplish the desired purpose in the year 1950, which is over 10 years after the Friant Dam was commenced, will only require a designation of $72,000,000 to be applied toward the above mentioned work.

As a result of the above completion, supplemental surface and underground water would be made available, and the use of electric power for pumping would greatly decrease, with a resultant saving of thousands of dollars to the farmers of the area. There seems to be no possible argument against the request that all possible funds be appropriated to complete the irrigation facilities.

I know that all requests for appropriations to your committee are accompanied by statements of dire need, but I want to assure you that it is literally true that unless water is available by the year 1950, much of the acreage of farmers in the area will be forced out of production because of depleted underground water supply and recurring additional expense in deepening wells and installation of costly heavy pumping equipment. These farmers have been compelled to do progressively more expensive pumping during the 10 years that they have waited for the completion of the project. They should not be asked to wait longer.

The area to receive supplemental water from the Central Valley project has a rural population larger than the State of Oregon or the State of Washington or the combined population of the States of Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, and Utah. It is a highly developed area with a rural population dependent upon its continued agricultural prosperity. It has all the other resources which will make it possible for it to continue to grow.

The supplemental water to be supplied will be furnished to lands already highly developed agriculturally; that is, lands that have been cultivated for over 25 years.

The lands to receive the water are small acreages and in almost every instance, the farmers in these areas have banded together and have formed water service districts under the laws of the State of California, which will purchase the water from the project and distribute it to the farmers in their respective districts. Most of those districts already have canal systems available to accept immediate delivery of water.

I want to repeat that the problem is very serious and needs immediate attention. It must be admitted that even the completion of the above request will not solve all of the water problems of the San Joaquin Valley, nor will it furnish supplemental water to all lands under irrigation in that area, but it will provide the immediate relief necessary.

I, therefore, again urge that funds for the completion of the Delta Mendota canal, Friant-Kern canal, Delta cross channel, and the Tracy pumping system be given immediate recognition and priority, so that the water features of the project will be immediately completed.

Mr. Chairman, in 1949 the Appropriations Committee of the House and the committee of similar jurisdiction of the other body recommended substantially less money than the Corps of Army Engineers requested. The respective Houses accepted the recommendations of their committees. Presumably, this action was taken for economy reasons.

It is also understandable that flood-control projects heretofore authorized based upon the recommendations of the Corps of Engineers in 30 States and Alaska are each entitled to sufficient appropriations for their completion at a reasonable date. However, if total moneys available are limited, it becomes the duty of this Congress to determine which of the projects should be given special attention in the national interest.

On another occasion, in March of 1949, I advised the committee of this body as follows:

My name is THOMAS H. WERDEL, Congressman of the Tenth District of California. I desire to file this written statement on behalf of the Isabella project on Kern River in California, and I will make additional oral remarks in regard to the Isabella project, together with the projects known as Success, Terminus, and Pine Flat, all of which are treated as a unit.

The Congress appropriated $1,250,000 to be expended during the 1948 fiscal year on the Isabella project, and Congress finally appropriated $2,500,000 for that project during the fiscal year 1949. The present estimated cost of this project is in excess of $14,000,000.

During the 2 years for which funds have been appropriated, work has been commenced upon the construction of this project involving the construction of an auxiliary dam, the relocation of State highways and provision for the relocation of a water conduit, which is an element of a hydroelectric power development in the reservoir area.

I am appearing here today in support of the recommendation made by the Water Resources Board of the State of California that an appropriation be made for this project, to be expended during the fiscal year 1950, in the amount of $6,000,000. The Presidential Budget has recommended one-half this amount.

I do not feel that it is sound economy for projects of this magnitude to be developed over an extended period of time, due to greater costs not only of supervision and planning but likewise of construction.

The character of the floods produced by the Kern River watershed has created an extreme hazard in the past and, with the rapid growth and development of the exposed area continuing at the same rate as in the past decade, these hazards will assume greater proportions as time goes by. The report of the Army engineers was completed 9 years ago and the subsequent delay in the construction of this project has caused great property losses, as evidenced by the information contained in the written statement I have submitted in which, for the year 1943, it is shown that with three other streams, the Kings, Keweah and Tule Rivers, emptying into Tulare Lake Basin in addition to the Kern, an estimated damage of $10,000,000 for that year alone was caused. These losses were all to agricultural crops of great value to the general public, as well as the producer, consisting of cotton, alfalfa, grain, sugar beets and other similar crops.

The control of these four streams is essential for the final protection of this great productive area of over 250,000 acres, in addition to the local areas existing along the stream channels themselves. Kern River threatens the city of Bakersfield, a community having a metropolitan population estimated, at the present time, to consist of 120,000 persons. Bakersfield lies many miles upstream along the river from the Tulare Lake Basin. During flood stages the water surface in the river channel has stood 17 feet above the developed business district of Bakersfield. From this, it is restrained by levees constructed of poor materials, which seep dangerously at such times. It has been estimated by the Army Engineers that one flood alone which occurred during February 1937, could have caused property loss in excess of $5,000,000, if the levee had failed to hold. The embankment was practically over-topped by that particular flood.

After the river leaves Bakersfield, it passes through and either floods or exposes to flooding a great area devoted to agriculture and the production of oil. Several large oilfields, having great productive capacity, are adjacent to or directly in the path of floods. Great damage could be caused to the oilfields, which are a nonreplenishing resource of the area. Exclusive of the values of oil, real property values in the areas threatened by flooding have increased approximately 65 percent in the past 8 years.

The report of the Army engineers shows not only that protection from floods, the dominant reason for the creation of the reservoir, is adequately taken care of, but also that the proposed storage of 550,000 acre-feet will provide a nominal betterment to the existing irrigation rights on the river. As an indication of the dominance of flood protection, the report also shows that the ratio of value of average annual flood benefit to irrigation benefit is 5 to 1. As a matter of fact, the average amount of additional useful water provided to the existing users is only 8 percent of the full requirement, with no useful supply available for the irrigation of any new lands not now irrigated from the river.

This average is not indicative of the fact that in actuality, the useful new water may vary from nothing in some years, to several times the mean in other years, so that its usefulnes cannot be fully depended upon.

The irrigation interests have stated they are willing to contribute a reasonable sum to the cost of the project, the amount of which will be determined by negotiations between the Army and the interested parties, as provided for in the authorization act of 1944, Public Law 534, Seventy-eighth Congress.

The service area receiving surface water from Kern River is one in which no water is required from any outside source, having an adequate supply within its own rights.

Besides the support of the State of California, the project has been consistently supported by the governing bodies of both the city of Bakersfield and the county of Kern.

This project is also shown by the report of the Army engineers to be one of outstanding merit in that the ratio of total benefits to cost is 2.8 to 1. On the basis of the facts as disclosed by the thorough investigations of the War Department and local agencies, it is unanimously agreed that the early completion of the Isabella Dam is a matter of great urgency. It is our earnest hope that Congress will recognize this fact by granting an appropriation of an amount sufficient to continue this work at an accelerated and more efficient rate.

When the same subject was under consideration before the Subcommittee on Civil Functions, House Appropriations Committee, on January 18 of last year, I again appeared before that committee and advised them as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee on Civil Functions, I believe it would be helpful to point out that the area of California being considered when we discuss the Kings, Kaweah, Tule, and Kern Rivers, is geographically constituted as follows:

The crest of the Sierra Nevada Mountains is approximately 100 miles east of the Pacific Ocean and the prevailing cyclonic winds from off the Pacific and Aleutian Islands are forced to rise to the altitude of 14,000 feet in the course of traveling that 100 miles. Mount Whitney is in that group. The range of mountains itself is probably 50 miles wide with hanging canyons of great altitude and steep slopes to the valley below. The mountains drop off very abruptly to the foothills and then to the San Joaquin Valley, the floor of which has an altitude of about 300 feet in the area constituting the delta country of the four streams which also constitutes the areas where floods occur. We should bear in mind that heavy water deposits are on the western slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains due to the fact that the prevailing winds from the northwest are cyclonic in nature.

The flood control problem is different each year. Some years there is very little flood water. However, on one occasion not too long ago a high-school teacher in Bakersfield took a group of boys by boat on the flood waters of these four streams a distance of 300 miles to San Francisco Bay.

Nearly all of the lands constituting the area threatened with floods by these four streams is valuable agricultural land, if it is properly protected. In addition to the agricultural values, there is a comparable degree of loss threatened each year due to the fact that the lower reaches of the Kern River, in the area threatened by floods, are now producing oil in large quantities.

The area between the Sierra Nevada and Coast Ranges to San Francisco constitutes the San Joaquin Valley. The Sacramento Valley extends about 250 miles north of the San Joaquin Valley.

The projects we are talking about are between the two mountain ranges: The Isabella Reservoir is on the Kern River; Pine Flat Reservoir is on the Kings River, and each of these rivers empties into what is known as Tulare Lake, which is the area, in excess of 200,000 acres, which has been previously mentioned by the witnesses today. The Tulare Lake Basin has been intermittently flooded in the past, even with relatively nominal amounts of snow in the high mountains.

The Success and Terminus Dams are on the two streams lying between the Kings River to the north and the Kern River to the south, the Tule and Kaweah Rivers, respectively.

It is my understanding that when this problem was first presented by my predecessor, Mr. A. J. Elliott, there was some small opposition in regard to the Success and Terminus Dams. I believe all of that opposition has now been removed and that the construction of the Success and Terminus Dams is now desired by all of the communities threatened by those streams, as well as by the people who have the agricultural developments, including those in the Tulare Lake Basin.

The reason I have mentioned the rivers—Kings, Kaweah, Tule, and Kern—collectively is that this project has from its inception been considered as a unit, for the very good reason that floods should be controlled on all four streams or a large part of the efficiency of flood control on the Kings and Kern Rivers will be lost. The reason for that loss is that all four streams, in years of excess water, flood the Tulare Lake Basin.

I am advised that the Bureau of the Budget, although it has heretofore recommended and this committee has appropriated moneys for engineering studies, has this year failed to recommend funds for the commencement of construction on either the Kaweah or Tule Rivers.

I want to point out to the committee that it is still a fact that the four streams involved, necessarily should be treated as a unit, even though most of the threat of flood comes from the larger streams, which are the Kings and the Kern. I also want to remind the committee that much of the area threatened with flood by the Kings and Kern Rivers has been developed by people who rely upon the express belief that this committee would appropriate the funds and that the Army engineers would complete the construction of flood-control developments on those rivers as expeditiously as possible. At the present time we are having one of the largest snowfalls in recent history on the high elevations of those rivers, and before the winter is out we may well expect so much water above the normal flow of the rivers as to wipe out a large part of the developments made in the threatened areas. Much of that development has been made by people who were forced to leave the Dust Bowl area, and who cannot afford such losses. I make mention of this subject for the reason that I now find that the Bureau of the Budget has not recommended that this Congress appropriate even 50 percent of the money heretofore not appropriated but still needed to complete the construction of the Isabella Dam. The result of such action is twofold—the threat of floods will be continued probably beyond the year 1952 and the cost of the project will be increased an unknown percentage due to the fact that continuing contracts cannot be let.

Mr. Elliott, who preceded me here, was advised in his last year that this matter, including the Tule and Kaweah Rivers, would be given the "go" signal by the Bureau of the Budget for the year 1949. The fact is that the people in the area would like to see those projects move along and get into the construction stage together.

It is a fact that the Army engineers have recommended a small appropriation for both Terminus Reservoir and Success Reservoir, but again this year, the Bureau of the Budget has not seen fit to include those items.

I am filing the resolution of the Terminus Dam Project Committee, which was unanimously passed at their meeting held in Tulare, Calif., on January 13, 1950; also a telegram, dated January 17, 1950, addressed to me by Mayor Jack Davis, of the city of Visalia; likewise one on the Terminus Dam project. I ask that they be inserted to immediately follow my remarks in the RECORD.

In conclusion, I want the record to show that practically all of the areas threatened with flood by any one of the four streams that I have mentioned lie in the Tenth Congressional District of California, the district that I represent, which area is included in the counties of Kings, Tulare, and Kern in that State.

I believe that this committee should conclusively presume that all of the construction projects that it has considered can receive a substantial saving in the over-all cost, by the setting of a definite time when completion will be accomplished, so that firm contracts can be let.

I respectfully request, in the interest of the areas threatened with floods by the four streams that I have mentioned, that this committee pay particularly close attention to the statements heretofore made today by Mr. Chas. L. Kaupke, engineer for Kings River Water Association, and Mr. George L. Henderson, engineer for Kern River area.

Mr. Chairman, in 1949, President Truman, through the Bureau of the Budget, recommended only $3,500,000 of the sum of approximately $7,500,000 estimated as necessary to complete the Isabella Reservoir project. The House cut the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget almost in half and allowed only $2,000,000. I followed the matter into the committee of the other body, where I appeared with other witnesses in an effort to increase the recommended appropriation in the other Chamber.

In connection with Isabella Reservoir, the committee of the other body did increase the amount appropriated by the House from $2,000,000 to $3,250,000. The increase allowed by the other body and finally agreed to by the House for last year was sufficient to permit the Corps of Army Engineers to announce that the Isabella Dam can be completed by the 1st of January 1953.

Speaking for the people of California, residing in that area threatened by flood during the spring run-off of the Kern River, I want to tell you that I am grateful for that increase, which was agreed to by this body.

During the fiscal year 1951 there were over 195 projects theretofore authorized on which partial appropriations had theretofore been made spreading over 39 States and Alaska as part of the civil functions recommendations of the Corps of Army Engineers. These projects involve a total cost when completed in excess of $4,000,000,000, on which only one-fourth has been appropriated to date. The Bureau of the Budget recommended only $460,000,000 on all of those projects for last year. The Appropriations Committee of this House cut $130,000,000 from the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget. However, action by the other body resulted in total appropriations of about $419,000,000.

I am sure it will be of interest to the House to know that the original estimated cost of Isabella Dam on the Kern River made in 1939 was $6,800,000. The 1950 estimated cost is $14,300,000, and although the reports of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of this House for the year 1951 show estimates of the civil functions of the Department of the Army indicating that the 1951 estimated cost of Isabella Dam is still only $14,300,000, I believe that spokesmen for the Corps of Army Engineers will now estimate that cost as being at least $5,000,000 higher, or a total of over $19,000,000. Similar increases in cost of construction can be shown for Pine Flat Reservoir. I have to admit, of course, that increasing construction costs are probably similar for all of the other 195 projects or more heretofore authorized and on which appriations for construction have heretofore been made.

It is my purpose to bring to the attention of the House at this time, as I intend to do again before the proper committees of this House and the proper committees of the other body, that economy in Government as well as efficiency, require appropriations to be made so that firm contracts can be let to responsible contractors for the completion of those projects which necessarily must be completed for the security of the country even when we are considering curtailment of expenditures for a military effort.

I am sure that spokesmen for the Corps of Army Engineers will recommend such appropriations for the completion of Isabella and Pine Flat Dams at the earliest date that they can be completed from a construction standpoint. In this connection, I want to quote the report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for the year 1949, in regard to the four rivers—Kern, Kings, Kaweah, and Tule—each of which threatens the highly productive lands of the southern San Joaquin Valley with annual floods:

ISABELLA RESERVOIR, KERN RIVER, CALIF.

Location: The area covered by this project comprises the upper watershed of Kern River and Poso and Caliente Creeks, their valley alluvial fans, the Kern and Buena Vista Lake areas, and that portion of the San Joaquin Valley south of Tulare Lake Basin. Kern River is the most southerly of the major streams flowing into the San Joaquin Valley and drains an area of some 2,400 square miles in the Sierra Nevada. North Fork and South Fork, headwaters of Kern River, have their sources in the high Sierra Nevada, flow south 83 and 67 miles, respectively, and join near the town of Isabella to form Kern River, which flows thence southwest 72 miles past the city of Bakersfield to a point in the valley through just north of Buena Vista Lake. River flows at this point are either diverted into the Buena Vista Lake Basin for temporary storage or are carried northwest along the trough of the valley toward Tulare Lake Basin by improved flood and irrigation channels. Under normal conditions of run-off the flow of Kern River below Bakersfield is gradually dissipated by irrigation diversions so that Kern River water reaches Tulare Lake Basin only during large floods. Poso Creek drains an area of 290 square miles lying west of Isabella and north of Kern River. Its flows are usually dissipated before reaching the valley trough. Caliente Creek drains an area of 470 square miles adjoining the lower Kern Basin to the south. Its flows are dissipated in the valley floor south of Bakersfield. The valley area dependent for water supply on Kern River and Poso and Caliente Creeks, commonly called the service area, is approximately 1,560 square miles in extent.

Existing project: This provides for construction of Isabella Reservoir on Kern River, Calif., for flood control and other purposes, at an estimated first cost (1949) of $14,300,000 and $71,000 annually for maintenance and operation. The existing project was adopted by the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944. (See H. Doc. 513, 78th Cong., 2d sess., which contains the latest published map.)

Local cooperation: Payment, as determined by the Secretary of the Army upon the basis of continuing studies by the Bureau of Reclamation, the Department of the Army, and local organizations, is to be made to the United States by the State or other responsible agency for the conservation storage when used. Local interests state they will meet these requirements. The State of California has officially adopted the project.

Operations and results during fiscal year: Preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications for construction was continued. Construction by contract of an earthfill auxiliary dam was begun in March 1948, and was completed in November 1948. Construction by contract of a core storage warehouse was begun in June 1948, and was completed late in July 1948. State Highway Routes 57 and 142, were relocated. Temporary housing facilities were acquired and operated, an auto mechanics' shop building erected, and educational facilities secured. By contract, a test fill was started April 22, 1949. Land acquisition (including improvements, disposals, and damages) was continued. Construction of main outlet gates by contract was started. Total cost of new work was $1,277,587.31; total expenditures were $1,394,699.62.

Condition at end of fiscal year: Final contract plans are being prepared; construction work on this project was started in March 1948. The total cost to date was $1,984,195.35 for new work, total expenditures were $2,016,024.28.

Proposed operations: The balance unexpended on June 30, 1949, amounting to $1,841,975.72, plus accounts receivable of $267,110.56, and an alotment of $2,350,000 made in fiscal year 1950, a total of $4,460,086.28 will be applied as follows:

Accounts payable	$246,281.63
New work:
Continuation of preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications, by hired labor, including hydraulic model studies and main dam test fill, July 1949 to June 1950	250,000.00
Construction of main dam outlet works, by contract July 1949 to January 1950	393,060.00
Acquisition (partial) of land and improvements, entire fiscal year	620,000.00
Furnishing slide gates for diversion tunnel, by supply contract, September 1949 to June 1950	160,000.00
Provision of educational facilities, by contract, July 1949 to June 1950	7,000.00
Operation of Government housing, July 1949 to June 1950	6,000.00
Relocation of electric transmission line, by contract, work completed in fiscal year 1949, deferred costs	6,006.45
Construction of administration and service buildings, and lookout, by contract, March to June 1950	120,000.00
Initiation of construction of main dam, spillway, auxiliary dam, etc., by continuing contract, commencing in April 1950	850,000.00

Payment to Southern California Edison Co., for relocation of Borel Canal and appurtenances, by continuing contract during fiscal year	$525,000.00
Initiation of relocation of county road between Kernville and Fairview, by continuing contract, March to June 1950	90,000.00
Initiation of relocation of Greenhorn Mountain Highway, State Highway No. 142, by continuing contract, September 1949 to June 1950	460,000.00
Concreting of outlet tunnel, by contract, February to June 1950	500,000.00
Furnishing Borel Canal slide gates, by supply contract, January 1949 to June 1950	130,000.00
Relocation of telephone line, by contract, March 1950 to June 1950	53,000.00
Engineering services for Borel Canal relocation, by contract, February to June 1950	20,000.00
Miscellaneous minor activities incidental to orderly prosecution of work, including fencing, firebreaks, minor buildings, etc., July 1949 to June 1950	23,738.20
Total for new work	4,213,804.65
Total for all work	4,460,086.28

The additional sum of $4,000,000 is needed to be appropriated for the following schedule of work during the fiscal year 1951:

New work:
Continuation of construction of Greenhorn Mountain Highway, State Highway No. 142	$300,000
Continuation of construction of main dam, spillway, auxiliary dam	1,820,000
Utility revisions and miscellaneous items	300,000
Acquisition of lands and improvements	750,000
Payment to Southern California Edison Co., for relocation of Borel Canal and appurtenances	500,000
Completion of relocation of county road between Kernville and Fairview	300,000
Total for new work	4,000,000

KINGS RIVER AND TULARE LAKE, INCLUDING PINE FLAT RESERVOIR, CALIF.

Location: The area covered by this project comprises the upper watershed of Kings River, its valley, alluvial fan or delta, and the lake bed known as Tulare Lake. The upper basin above the town of Piedra is rugged and mountainous. Below Piedra the river enters the relatively flat alluvial valley where the river divides, one branch known as Fresno slough flowing north to join the San Joaquin River, and the second south to Tulare Lake, an area which in its unreclaimed state varied from a completely dry condition to a body of water some 750 square miles in extent. There is no natural outlet from this lake as it is separated from the San Joaquin Basin by a low ridge, but lake waters have escaped over this ridge at least once since settlement of the region. Tulare Lake also receives floodwaters of Tule, Kaweah, and Kern Rivers in some years. The area below Piedra, including Tulare Lake, is known as the Kings River service area.

Existing project: This provides for construction of the Pine Flat Reservoir with a gross storage capacity of 1,000,000 acre-feet and of the supplemental channel improvement work, at an estimated total first cost (1949) of $51,121,000, and $112,000 annually for maintenance and operation.

The existing project was adopted by the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944. (See H. Doc. 630, 76th Cong., 3d sess., which contains the latest published map.)

Local cooperation: Payment, as determined by the Secretary of the Army upon the basis of continuing studies by the Bureau of Reclamation, the Department of the Army, and local organizations, is to be made to the United States by the State or other responsible agency for the conservation storage when used. Local interests state they will meet these requirements, when an equitable allocation of charges is made. The State of California has officially adopted the project.

Operations and results during fiscal year: New work: Preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications was continued. Excavation of the right abutment of main dam was begun February 1948 and was completed in September 1948. Twenty-four portable houses complete with roads and utilities were furnished and erected. Telephone lines were relocated, cattle guards, trash racks, and a core storage warehouse were constructed, and educational facilities furnished. Land acquisition (including improvements, disposals, and damages) was continued. Relocation of the Hughes Creek Road from Sunnyside Summit to Trimmer, by contract, was begun in February 1948 and was 92 percent completed at the end of the fiscal year. It is estimated to be completed August 5, 1949. Total cost for new work was $2,942,074.87, and total expenditures, $3,273,370.81.

Condition at end of fiscal year: Final contract plans are being prepared; construction work on this project was started in April 1947; and to date the following features of the work have been accomplished: Partial relocation of the Hughes Creek Road from Sunnyside Summit to Trimmer, and erection of fencing along the road; construction and fencing of Hughes Creek-Pine Flat detour road; excavation for right and left abutments for the dam; erection of 24 portable housing units complete with all utilities and roads, etc. The total cost for new work to date was $5,380,918.85, and the total expenditures were $5,333,688.24.

Proposed operations: The balance unexpended on June 30, 1949, amounting to $1,366,311.76, and an allotment of $7,000,000, made in fiscal year 1950, a total of $8,366,311.76, will be applied as follows:

Accounts payable	$260,230.61
New work:
Continuation of preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications, including hydraulic model studies, and additional core drilling, by hired labor, and by contract, entire fiscal year	660,000.00
Completion of relocated Hughes Creek Road, by contract, July to September 1949	127,000.00
Construction of bridge and measuring weir, by contract, July 1949 to June 1950	166,000.00
Construction of permanent Government housing, by contract, July 1949 to June 1950	170,000.00
Revision of educational facilities, by contract, July 1949 to June 1950	40,000.00
Paving and utilities for portable housing, by contract, July to August 1949	32,000.00
Operation of Government housing, July 1949 to June 1950	18,000.00
Acquisition of land and improvements, July 1949 to June 1950	365,000.00
Relocation of Vincent power line, by contract, Southern California Edison Co.	240,000.00
Construction of main dam and appurtenances, by continuing contract, commencing November 1949	5,400,000.00
Main dam sluice gates, by continuing contract, commencing August 1949	674,000.00
Construction of look-out and access roads, by contract, November 1949 to February 1950	106,000.00
Construction of grammar school, by contract, January to June 1950	78,000.00
Miscellaneous minor activities incidental to orderly prosecution of work, including fencing, minor relocations, sidewalks, landscaping, etc	30,081.15
Total for new work	8,106,081.15
Grand total	8,366,311.76

The additional sum of $17,500,000 is needed to be appropriated for the following schedule of work during the fiscal year 1951:

New work:
Continuation of advance planning	$250,000
Continuation of construction of main dam and appurtenances	16,200,000
Spillway gates and miscellaneous operating equipment, by contract	300,000
Continuation of acquisition of lands and improvements	300,000
Continuation of utility modifications	450,000

KAWEAH AND TULE RIVERS, INCLUDING TERMINUS AND SUCCESS RESERVOIRS, CALIF.

Location: The area covered by this project comprises the upper watersheds of Kaweah and Tule Rivers, their valley alluvial fans and the reclaimed Tulare Lake Basin, their common terminus. Kaweah River, which drains an area of 1,250 square miles, is formed by the junction of its North, Middle, and South Forks near Three Rivers, flows southwest 10 miles through low foothills and emerges on the valley floor near the town of Lemon Cove. At this point the river divides into two channels, the flow to each being divided equally by control weirs. The northerly channel, known as St. Johns River, flows west 23 miles and unites with Cottonwood Creek to form Cross Creek, which flows thence southwest 35 miles to Tulare Lake Basin. The southerly channel, which continues as Kaweah River, flows southwest 4 miles and then divides into numerous distributary channels. Flows in these channels not diverted for irrigation or lost by seepage cross the delta region and unite with Tule River or Cross Creek to enter Tulare Lake Basin. Tule River, which drains an area of 630 square miles adjoining the Kaweah Basin on the south, is formed by the junction of its North and Middle Forks near Springville, flows southwest 13 miles and emerges on the valley floor near the city of Porterville. From this point the river continues west 39 miles across the alluvial fan to Tulare Lake Basin.

Existing project: This provides for construction of the Terminus and Success Reservoir projects, including supplemental spreading works, at an estimated first cost (1949) of $24,539,000 (including $13,395,000 for Terminus and $11,144,000 for Success), and $13,000 annually for maintenance and operation of the reservoirs. The existing project was adopted by the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944. (See H. R. Flood Control Committee Doc. 1, 78th Cong., 2d sess., and H. Doc. 559, 78th Cong., 2d sess., which contains the latest published map.)

Local cooperation: Payment, as determined by the Secretary of the Army upon the basis of continuing studies by the Bureau of Reclamation, the Department of the Army, and local organizations, is to be made to the United States by the State or other responsible agency for the conservation storage when used. Local interests state they will meet these requirements. The State of California has officially adopted the project.

Operations and results during fiscal year: (a) Terminus Reservoir on Kaweah River: The cost of new work during the year was $60,288.72 and the expenditures were $65,165.14, for work on detailed plans and contract plans and specifications.

(b) Success Reservoir: The cost of new work during the year was $57,286.45 and the expenditures were $61,191.30 for continuing preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications.

Total project new work cost was $117,575.17, and total expenditures were $126,356.44.

Condition at end of fiscal year: Detailed plans and contract plans and specifications are in preparation for test fills for Terminus and Success Reservoirs. Construction work on this project has not been started. Total new work cost to date for the project was $415,385.07 and total expenditures were $396,854.14.

Proposed operations: The unexpended balances on June 30, 1949, of $85,541.72 for Terminus Reservoir, and $87,604.14 for Success Reservoir, and allotments of $120,000, made in September 1949, will be applied to payment of accounts payable amounting to $13,664.56 and $4,866.37, respectively, and for new work in continuing the preparation of detailed plans and contract plans and specifications for these reservoirs, $131,877.16 and $142,737.77, respectively, July 1949 through June 1950.

The additional sum of $1,000,00 is needed to be appropriated for the following schedule of work during the fiscal year 1951:

New work:
Continuation of preparation of plans and specifications for Terminus Reservoir	$200,000
Acquistion of lands and improvements, and relocation of utilities, Terminus Reservoir	300,000
Total for Terminus Reservoir	500,000

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that it is unnecessary to point out that the protection of Kern, Tulare, and Kings Counties in California, which were always at the top of the list of counties producing for the last war effort, is necessary to properly prepare for the national security in these difficult days of military preparedness.

I have no hesitancy in telling you that I have discussed this subject with Maj. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, Chief of the Corps of Army Engineers, and that he will advise you through the proper committees of this House that he considers expenditures for the control of floods in valuable agricultural areas as necessary expenditures even while we are considering a wartime budget.

Only 6 weeks ago, all four of the streams that I have mentioned were at flood stage. Normally, the flood season arrives during the spring runoff when the snows at the high elevations of the Sierra Nevada Mountains are melting. Last fall, that area had an early snow followed by rain. The damage to public and private property on the Kern River alone exceeded $3,000,000. The damage on the other rivers hereinabove mentioned was relatively even greater. Due to the heavy population and development of the threatened area which, as I have heretofore mentioned, was the result of reliance upon completion of these projects within a reasonable time following the year 1938, the damage could have been a hundredfold greater had there been a very small amount of additional water in the flood crest or had the local authorities been less diligent in the performance of their duties.

In conclusion, I want to again thank the Members of the House and the other body for the consideration that they have given to me and other people of the area in presenting this subject during the last 2 years, and for the action that they have taken to date. I discussed this subject with Maj. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, last Saturday morning and he advises me that they are going to support recommendations for the completion of the Isabella Dam on Kern River under firm contracts with responsible contractors capable of completing the project as soon as it is physically possible for the construction work to be completed. He has fixed that date as January 1, 1953, which means that this threat to national security and the war effort must be borne by the people of the area and the Nation as a whole through the flood seasons of 1951 and 1952.

Both in the interest of national security and in behalf of the thousands of innocent people who have settled in the threatened areas in reliance upon previous action of Congress, I want to point out to you the threat to national security is greatest in the areas of the four streams I have mentioned. I believe it must also be admitted by this House that the increase in estimated cost from $6,500,000 to over $19,000,000, and the threat to thousands of small families in lives and property is largely the responsibility of this Congress as a result of its prior action and the delay through "pork barrel" tactics in the completion of projects heretofore authorized and on which construction has heretofore commenced.

For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1951, the Bureau of the Budget has recommended the sum of $8,695,000 to continue construction of the Pine Flat Dam, and $4,975,000 for the Isabella Dam and Reservoir. It is felt that these amounts are in line with appropriations that will be needed in the present session. However, if it is deemed necessary, General Pick may appear before the committee later this year and request additional funds. Appropriations for continuing the planning studies for the proposed Success and Terminus Dams have not been requested by the Corps of Army Engineers for this year, nor was any money appropriated for that purpose in the last fiscal year. The Corps of Army Engineers explained that in making their recommendations to the Bureau of the Budget, they were restricted by Presidential directive in requesting appropriations for new projects not already under construction.

It is also inequitable and unjust for this Government to delay in the payment of fair values for the properties taken by this Government for construction of the Isabella Reservoir. You all know that these values fixed by the Government are always low, and displaced people must make investments elsewhere so as to be able to move from their property when the Government advises them that it plans to complete the project or require their removal. All of those people need the moneys due from the Government for their condemned property to make their new investments. There is no justification in law or equity for delay in this regard.

I respectfully and sincerely again ask your consideration in connection with these projects and call to your special attention that the threatened damage in the agricultural area involved is special and peculiar to the security of the country and the projects must be considered as part of the national defense effort.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, in considering this $2,000,000,000 supplemental appropriation bill for naval construction, one can hardly question the need for a build-up of the Navy within the limits of its prescribed mission. As part of the present mobilization program the Navy's obligations under its mission obviously will be greatly expanded. Under such circumstances it will become increasingly difficult to question any Navy appropriation requests of this or any type. The real problem centers in our long-range strategic plan which is still undetermined, or, if so, still unannounced.

Further, in the current frantic haste to do immediately what should have been done long since in the interests of national security, it is quite obviously the order of the day to give the military what it wants, with few questions asked, and without demanding the normal justification for efficient and economic utilization of resources and manpower. Under these unfortunate circumstances, one must be content these days to isolate from the multibillion dollar security program only the obvious misadventures in military financing.

The projected 60,000 ton carrier constitutes, it is understood, some 60 percent of the total warship tonnage covered in the request. I am inclined to believe, despite the cautiously worded description of the reporting committee, that this is substantially the same supercarrier project. It is difficult, even in the frenzy of the moment, to understand why it now rates only an hour's discussion on the floor of the House, a sketchy explanation from the reporting committee, unprecedented security classification, and virtually no coverage in the public press.

It is possible, though not probable, that this is not the same supercarrier project that was canceled once before. The projected vessel is reported to be lighter than the other, though, if newspaper reports are correct, it will cost even more. The newly projected supercarrier will carry, it is also reported, planes capable of delivering the atomic bomb. If true, this brings up the obvious question of the mission. The atomic bomb is generally conceded to be a strategic weapon. If strategic atomic bombing is to take place from shipboard, other questions arise which should be of interest to the Congress. Our atomic stockpile is generally conceded to be our most precious military possession. If a portion of that stockpile is to be put to sea, Congress is being asked to make a far-reaching decision.

In the past, Congress has heard evidence that far more than one vessel is involved. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—volume 95, part 15, pages A4537–A4538—contains a report by one of our colleagues, the Honorable Mr. BOYKIN, of Alabama, that the now canceled supercarrier would entail a task force of 140 supporting vessels of different types and 45,000 personnel and would cost some one and a half billion dollars, a figure which we must assume would be considerably higher today, and that this huge force would function so that only 28 bombers could operate off the decks of the supercarrier; and, further, that the Navy's long-range plan envisaged no less than seven of these supercarriers, and, of course, seven supporting task forces. Congress at least should know whether the bill now under consideration is the start of such a program, or any part of it, and if further supplemental appropriations will be necessary to complete the supercarrier or a supporting task force. Only then can Congress weigh the project in proper perspective.

Should Congress satisfy itself regarding the related subjects outlined above, it deserves to hear further evidence on other basic questions which must always be raised in connection with the supercarrier project, namely, the vulnerability of the supercarrier to new-type snorkel submarines in light of the Navy's own post-World War II exercises off Newfoundland and in the Caribbean, and the vessel's vulnerability to land-based aircraft; the supercarrier's production time in relation to the programed development of other weapons; the supercarrier's cost in critical resources and critical manpower in relation to over-all defense needs; the supercarrier's ability, or lack of it, to function in certain key areas such as the Mediterranean, and to utilize the Panama Canal; the supercarrier's effectiveness and recuperative ability under full-scale combat conditions rather than in a Korean-type conflict where enemy submarine and aerial opposition is completely lacking.

In the prolonged discussions of the past over the supercarrier, such questions as these were never satisfactorily answered. Perhaps they have since been resolved. If so, Congress and the people deserve to know something more than is now known about it.

Congress does not wish, it is evident, to hold up any priority projects of the military. But the supercarrier, by description of the reporting committee, is a long-range research and development project. Further discussion on the subject obviously will not jeopardize any immediate security needs. And even in this clouded "give the military what it wants" atmosphere which seems to prevail Congress cannot forget its obligations to the people regarding military expenditures.

Therefore, if the remainder of this bill bears a priority stamp, let it be considered in that light. And let the supercarrier request be considered, not in frantic haste but in proper perspective and in the light of the many unanswered questions regarding it. Let that portion of the bill containing the supercarrier request be considered apart, so Congress and the people can get these questions answered.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE].

LONG BEACH NAVY SHIPYARD REACTIVATED

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, being again a member of the important Armed Services Committee of this House and having heard all the discussion before the committee membership with reference to this bill, H. R. 1001, I voted in committee for it, and I now again happily do the same thing. I urge its passage by unanimous approval of the House membership.

Within the hour you have heard the distinguished chairman of our Armed Services Committee explain the bill and answer fully and frankly all the questions directed to him. In addition thereto, you have a committee report accompanying this bill for your attention in which the justification—yes, the absolute need of this bill becoming effective at the earliest possible date is more fully explained. On pages 4, 5, and 6 of the committee report is found the explanation of the changes to be made in the existing laws by virtue of the passage of H. R. 1001. I recommend that each of you take time to read the same to observe these changes.

I take this occasion also, and it is a very happy occasion to me to be able to announce to you that last week our distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Frank Matthews, personally notified me to announce that the Navy Department had that day issued an order immediately reactiviating the great Long Beach Naval Shipyard which is located in my home city of Long Beach, Los Angeles County, Calif.

That great and modern facility was inactivated as part of the so-called economy program by the former Secretary of Defense, taking into consideration the fact that there was a physical condition there with reference to the earth which the then Secretary of Defense felt chiefly justified his order. I know you will recall my active, vigorous opposition thereto on that ground at that time; and you will further recall that many members of the California delegation in the House cordially supported me in my opposition to the inactivation program.

The Long Beach Naval Shipyard was constructed as a necessary and essential World War II facility at a cost in excess of $75,000,000, and its wartime peak work force reached the substantial figure of at least 16,000 employees. The deactivation of this yard was commenced late in 1949 and was completely in mothballs by late June 1950. There remained in charge thereof merely a custodial force of about 500 employees, and at this time there is in command at the Long Beach Naval Base a distinguished naval captain, J. Y. Dannenberg. Just this week there has been directed to take charge of the shipyard unit of the great Long Beach Naval Base distinguished naval captain, Emmett E. Sprung.

Already hundreds upon hundreds of the former skilled and other workers are happily trending their way to the reemployment at this great naval facility which meant so much in the total national defense and national production of ships' program during World War II.

The world-famous Roosevelt drydock is located there and reputedly the most powerful ship crane is located there, it having been taken over from Germany as one of the war trophies and placed at the dockside of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard.

Secretary Matthews personally told me that full use would be made of the navy yard at the earliest possible date with an estimated employment by midsummer of at least 3,500 and that all departments of the yard would get under way at the earliest possible date. He stated that the present world conditions made the modern and valuable available facilities of this great Long Beach Naval Shipyard and Naval Base necessary at the earliest possible date.

During the last war and until the inactivation commenced, the yard was the chief repair base for the Pacific battleship fleet and is still the home base of that fleet. At the time of the order of inactivation in late 1949 it was generally conceded Nation-wide that because the Long Beach Naval Shipyard was the last great naval shipyard facility to be constructed prior to the war, it contained the very latest and best of work machinery and facilities to suit all modern needs and that there had been put into that yard the benefit of the considered experiences and opinions of the best authorities of our great Naval Establishment.

Furthermore, it would appear that this opinion was justified by reason of the magnificent achievements of the yard at all times and upon all assignments and missions. Not only has the city of Long Beach and its rapidly increasing population and all of its varied segments of commerce, trade, shipping, and oil always cordially welcomed what Long Beach terms the "Navy family"; but, needless to say, the personnel of the United States Navy and their families and all their connections who have found it necessary to live at Long Beach and in the Long Beach area on account of being assigned to work or services or duties at the Long Beach Naval Base have made and earned for themselves a place of utmost respect and real and warm welcome by all the civilian population of that whole area in which they have resided and worked. Too, from the greatest to the least, in terms of rank, they have contributed much to the prosperity and happiness and progress of Long Beach and to the other communities close by in which they have resided with their families.

In my frequent visits to the Long Beach Naval Shipyard, before it was inactivated, and also since, and by mail and by personal calls upon me and otherwise, I have been greatly inspired by the stories of self-sacrifice and of unselfish service and of most excellent attitudes held and activities rendered by the employed civilian population at the Long Beach naval facility at all times.

So, as it was from the beginning at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard, it is again anticipated with happy and confident outlook that by teamwork and mutual understanding and common objective the Navy personnel and the civilian personnel are beginning to team up to again so reactivate and carry on the necessary work and mission to be done at the great Long Beach Naval Shipyard that it again will make known records to be envied and respected by all.

And right here may I just say that I hope and trust that you, my colleagues from the Eastern, Midwestern, Central, and Southern States, have by this time learned or begun to learn and appreciate the ever-increasing importance and strategic location and relationship of the shipyards of the Pacific coast and all the installations and problems of the Pacific coast to the total problems of our beloved Nation. Increasingly, this Congress, the executive departments and the administrative departments of Government must familiarize themselves more than ever with the fact that never yet has either the naval or the civilian shipyard problem and national defense problem of the Nation been adequately met and provided for as relates to the increasing necessity of recognizing and providing for the necessity of these naval and privately owned and commercial shipyards of my native State of California and the other Pacific Coast States. Does not this present world emergency and the Korean War and the increasing importance of Asia and India and Africa, as far as marine geography is concerned teach us this lesson?

In closing may I say that, when the newspaper representative asked me to make a brief statement about the reopening of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard recently, I said:

I feel that the reactivation is not only timely, but it is tangible evidence of the strategic value and the necessity of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard as a permanent naval operating facility. This present order of earliest possible reactivation justifies my vigorous opposition from the beginning to the order of inactivation on the grounds stated at that time and to my continuing vigorous presentation of the need of keeping the yard ready to reopen at the earliest possible date with the least possible delay.

I compliment the Navy Department and its distinguished Secretary and the Chiefs of Staff and all the top officials of our Government in our beloved Nation who, again, have demonstrated their good judgment and common sense in this order of reactivation of this great naval shipyard facility. And I deem it a great honor and privilege to again publicly state, on behalf of my home city of Long Beach and the great Eighteenth Congressional District which I have the honor to represent for this third term, that the total Navy family will again be cordially welcomed and that the total civilian citizenry will again do its dead-level best to cooperate to the utmost in all mutual problems in this emergency hour for our Nation and for the world.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES].

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to congratulate warmly a great chairman and a great committee on this continuing evidence of their sound leadership in the field of American military preparedness.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, the presentation of this legislation brings to light one of the shabbiest performances by the executive branch of the Government in the history of this Nation. The President and his advisors, including the then Secretary of Defense, Mr. Johnson, canceled the construction of the supercarrier in April 1949. The blame rests solely on the doorstep of the White House. Congress originally authorized the ship and appropriated the necessary funds on the specific recommendations of our military leaders.

Because of this grievous error the cancellation of the carrier, the American taxpayers lost $20,000,000 in material and labor plus forty-five million in cost differential between the original supercarrier and the one proposed in this bill. In addition, Mr. Truman's concurrence in the cancellation of the supercarrier in 1949 has cost 2½ to 3 years in time.

With these facts unquestioned, can there be faith, past or present, in the preparedness decisions by the President? It is high time that the Congress cease being a rubber stamp to the dictatorial demands of the President and his advisers. The Eighty-first Congress made a horrible record simply because in most instances it bowed weakly to the requests of Mr. Truman. That Congress did not truly represent the people but rather submitted to the dictates of the executive branch of the Government. One of the few courageous stands taken by the Eighty-first Congress was the report of the House Committee on Armed Services condemning the action taken by Mr. Truman in canceling the supercarrier and firing Admiral Denfeld.

Our citizens are not so naive that they will believe there is any difference between the orginal supercarrier and the one proposed by this bill. The public would admire our President and his own military advisers if an honest statement were made admitting that an error had been made in 1949. No, that procedure is not followed. Instead, there is an attempt to justify the new carrier on the basis that it is really a different ship. Such subterfuge is reprehensible and should be exposed. A careful analysis of the blueprints of the two ships by qualified engineers would reveal, I am sure, no material difference between them. This is no time for "face saving." The administration would get public confidence by straightforward admissions of past errors.

The need of aircraft carriers is best evidenced by their use in the Korean War. Without carriers in that part of the world our land forces would be in even worse condition than we now find them.

In conclusion, I emphasize that this Congress must assert itself and not rubber stamp the demands of the President and his advisers. The people elected the Eighty-second Congress to participate jointly in military and foreign affairs decisions and the President for the benefit of our Nation had better cooperate or Congress will take over to better strengthen our Nation and restore the confidence of our people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to undertake the construction of, or to acquire and convert, not to exceed 500,000 tons of modern naval vessels in the following categories and subcategories:

(a) Combatant vessels, 315,000 tons, divided into:

1. Warships, 100,000 tons, including one aircraft carrier of not to exceed 60,000 tons.
2. Amphibious warfare vessels and landing craft, 175,000 tons.
3. Mine warfare vessels, 25,000 tons.
4. Patrol vessels, 15,000 tons.

(b) Auxiliary vessels, 175,000 tons.

(c) Service craft, 9,000 tons.

(d) Experimental types, 1,000 tons.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask the chairman of the committee a few questions. This measure provides for the expenditure of $2,000,000,000 for construction and conversion, as I understand it, but I see no limitation in the bill as to the amount of expenditure. Is there any limitation in the bill?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman is correct. There is no limitation. It all depends upon what it will cost. The Committee on Appropriations will be called upon to furnish the money to finish these vessels. It is now estimated it will cost in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000 to carry out the program.

Mr. GROSS. Is there any way that a limitation can be put in the bill?

Mr. VINSON. If a limitation is placed in the bill, it might turn out not to be the proper limitation because conditions may warrant the spending of more money.

Mr. GROSS. In other words, what the gentleman is saying is that we do not know how much longer this Truman inflation is going on, do we?

Mr. VINSON. May I point out to the gentleman I have for a long time been of the opinion that there should have been ceilings and controls on prices, and so forth. The gentleman is not making any point so far as I am concerned by calling that to my attention. I think we should have had controls a long time ago. I think the longer you put it off, the more inflation we will have.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman. May I ask him a further question? Is this construction and conversion program to be carried on under cost-plus contracts?

Mr. VINSON. It will be carried on under whatever authority the Navy has to make contracts; which in a great many instances is through negotiated contracts. It will probably all be by negotiated contracts.

Mr. GROSS. And on the basis of cost-plus?

Mr. VINSON. I do not know about that. But may I point out that in connection with the profits which were made during the war on ship construction they ran less than 2 percent.

Mr. GROSS. Less than cost-plus?

Mr. VINSON. There was less than 2 percent of profit on ship construction during the last war.

Mr. GROSS. I should like to ask if we have any surplus cruisers in the United States Navy.

Mr. VINSON. I would not call them surplus. We have a great many cruisers still in the mothball stage. But we want to keep them there, because we need them, and the security of the country requires them.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman think we have surplus cruisers to turn over to South America at this time?

Mr. VINSON. It was felt that those cruisers should be turned over to South America in furtherance of some idea of standardization of equipment and the good-neighbor policy. I am finding no fault with it. Of course we would have to spend a great deal of money to keep those cruisers modernized and bring them up to date. Those cruisers are about 14 or 15 years old.

Mr. GROSS. Is it not true that we have used cruisers and other combat vessels in the Pacific during World War II which were over 20 years old?

Mr. VINSON. That is right.

Mr. GROSS. And they performed good service, did they not?

Mr. VINSON. They certainly did.

Mr. GROSS. And yet we propose in this bill today to provide for conversion and construction to the tune of $2,000,000,000 and we are practically giving away warships to South America?

Mr. VINSON. No. We are prohibiting the giving away of any cruisers which belong to the fleet or anything else which belongs to the fleet.

Mr. GROSS. That is with reference to the terms of this bill. But they have already been given away.

Mr. VINSON. And the gentleman sat here and voted for it just like everybody else.

Mr. GROSS. I do not on the spur of the moment know whether I did or not. I do not remember when the act was passed.

Mr. VINSON. I have looked up the gentleman's record, and I do not find where he opposed it—and none of us did oppose it. We did not know what we were doing. We know now what we are doing. They cannot be given away in the future.

Mr. GROSS. When was that act passed?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman was right here. It was on the 25th day of July. The gentleman and all of us here gave this authority. None of us knew what we were doing.

Mr. GROSS. I think both of us will scrutinize much more carefully the activities of the Committee on Foreign Affairs henceforth, will we not?

Mr. VINSON. I have always been doing that, and I want the gentleman to get in the same frame of mind as I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] has brought up a question which I think we could well spend 5 minutes thinking about. I think the gentleman from Georgia, in answering the question that there was no limitation was on safe ground provided you want these goods delivered. I wish somebody would show me how to go out and make a firm commitment of sale or purchase for goods to be delivered over a long period of time—over a period of 6 months or 1½ years or 2 years or 3½ years, such as is provided for here. We cannot do it because there is no stability to the buying power of the great American monetary exchange which we call the dollar. That is what we are up against. Beefsteak may be $4 a pound within the next 4½ years. This conversion job and this new ship we have been discussing may cost us $20,000,000,000 before we are through. That is something for all of us to think about and to act upon if we get a chance.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. And yet we expect private business to form firm contracts; do we not?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, I do not, any more.

Mr. GROSS. We pay out billions of dollars under the cost-plus contract system.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not expect them to do it any more, because it would be expecting the impossible, because of these continually advancing costs, in both wages and materials.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. This cost-plus contract worries Members very much, and it used to worry me a great deal, but I heard some testimony by some admirals who had charge of construction work during the last war, and they testified, under oath, that the cost-plus cost of vessels and other things was cheaper in the net amount than the fixed, firm contract.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As long as you have negotiated contracts and the renegotiation procedure, I do not worry so much about the cost-plus contract, because you are supposed to pick those things up when you recheck the figures. Anyone familiar with accounting understands that procedure.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. I am very glad the gentleman raised that point. The Ways and Means Committee will report to the House within a few days a new renegotiation bill. Of course, the uncertainty in the cost of material and labor, the failure to have any ceilings, and the failure to have any limitation just makes it out of the question to say what these ships are going to cost.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON. We hope it will be $2,000,000,000, but we have a renegotiation bill to fix the price whenever they are fixed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope when that bill is reported by the Ways and Means Committee that the House will support it, because we need it.

Now we are up against this proposition on another score: We are trying to make up our minds whether or not we are going to support nine billion or sixteen billion additional taxes, or whether or not we are going to finance this program through deficit financing. As far as I am concerned—and I want to get this on the RECORD, so that my people will understand my position—as far as I am concerned personally, I am solidly in favor of cutting this budget to the irreducible minimum, and then enacting whatever Federal taxes are necessary to cover that budget. Now, that is right straight from the shoulder, and nobody has to guess about my position on that. I do not mean to say by that I am in favor of the budget that was submitted by the President, because I think there are a lot of unnecessary social do-goods, expansion of present social security, and other things in this budget that we can get along without. I am in favor of reducing some five or six or seven billion dollars from that budget, and then putting our people on a straight 48 hours per week base time; no overtime over 40 hours. Put them on a 48-hour week, and get out here and produce the stuff at today's price level, and run our national economy up to $330,000,000,000 or $350,000,000,000 per annum, which we can do; and assess the $62,000,000,000 of taxes, and you will have about 18 percent of the take out of that national income as you have about 18 percent when you were taking $38,000,000,000 out of the $225,000,000,000 national income. We can do the job if we make up our minds to do it. Otherwise, we can let the hounds of inflation devour us. That, I do not want.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time for the purpose of propounding a couple of questions to the chairman of the committee. They have regard to section 4. No doubt this has been considered by the committee, but I would appreciate it if the chairman would explain the reason for eliminating amphibious-warfare vessels, landing craft, and mine-warfare vessels from the list of those which this section prohibits being transferred without the consent of Congress.

Mr. VINSON. That is the auxiliary end, and they do not want auxiliaries.

Mr. KEATING. It is not clear to me—perhaps there is evidence before the committee to that effect—that other countries are not requesting amphibious-warfare vessels and these landing craft and mine-warfare vessels. I wonder whether those should not also be included in the prohibition against transfer.

Mr. VINSON. In the first place, no country wants that type of auxiliary ship and does not need them. Should they make request for them, in view of our position in regard to combatant types of vessels, no doubt they will come before the committee and say they have a request for auxiliaries and ask us what we think about it. We would probably have a hearing and probably, if the facts warranted, approve it. They could give away or sell auxiliaries, but not combatant types.

Mr. KEATING. We have, of course, great confidence in the gentleman and his committee. By that does the gentleman mean he feels he can assure the House that no such vessels, amphibious-warfare vessels, landing craft, and mine-warfare vessels will be given away or transferred or sold to foreign governments without the matter first being brought before the Congress

Mr. VINSON. I am satisfied that if any auxiliary ships were in process of being transferred they would consult the Committees on Armed Services of the House and the Senate, especially in view of the prohibition we are writing in the present bill.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I may say to the gentleman that the nature of the construction of auxiliary and amphibious craft is such that their life is very limited.

Mr. KEATING. And the gentleman also feels that if foreign governments should request that such ships be turned over to them the matter would be brought before the committee before definite action was taken?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. If this bill is enacted into law, yes.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. I feel sure the House will understand that in view of this proviso we put in the bill there will be no danger of the auxiliary ships or any other kind of ships being given away without specific act of Congress.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the gentleman for this assurance.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member [Mr. SHORT], and all the members of the Committee on Armed Services in bringing out this bill for the construction of naval craft. I congratulate them especially on the authorization of the building of the big airplane carrier which had it been proceeded with 18 months ago would have been completed today.

Mr. Chairman, we are working and fighting for the survival of our country; we are working and fighting for the protection of these youngsters who are in Korea. The construction of that great aircraft carrier would have meant fewer boys killed in Korea, fewer boys lying in the hospitals today.

Mr. Chairman, I am not alone in my thinking, because I have the opinion of naval experts that sufficient mobile bases in the form of aircraft carriers would mean that Russia and China or any other country would never dare strike us. If we have enough of these mobile aircraft carriers in the Pacific, the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Persian Gulf or wherever needed, this country will be superbly protected. I would gladly have voted for more aircraft carriers—a dozen if necessary.

Reference has been made to the death of Mr. Forrestal, former Secretary of Defense, and the giving of his life for his country. May I again remind the Members of the House of the sacrifice of Admiral Louis Denfeld because he dared tell the Congress and the country of the need for aircraft carriers in our naval construction, and for the construction of other seacraft under the sea and otherwise. He is not an unsung hero, because his praises are sung everywhere. Everyone in the Navy should get down on his knees and thank God for Louis Denfeld. The country as a whole should feel the same way.

Many men have difficult tasks to perform, but when they know in their hearts they are fighting for the survival of our country, no sacrifice is too great for them. The expenditure of money is insignificant, because the people of the country want the money spent in every necessary way to protect our Nation.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The state of preparedness that the Navy enjoyed in the beginning of the present Korean conflict was due in a large part to Admiral Denfeld because he was farsighted during his tenure of office as Chief of Naval Operations. I do not want to detract from Admiral Sherman when I make this assertion because he is also doing a good job.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes, he is doing a fine job but Admiral Denfeld paved the way for him. Many members of the Navy did not dare speak. The country was thoroughly aroused when Admiral Denfeld did speak, so therefore a great deal of good was accomplished. I shall vote, as I always have, for every wise measure involving our national defense.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Of course, this is not the place or time to open old sores, but if ever in our history a committee of Congress was justified in a fearless comprehensive report that it wrote, it was the Committee on Armed Services of the House in the B-36 hearings more than a year and a half ago. I think recent events in Korea have fully substantiated and corroborated the sound, solid, common-sense view that our committee took in those hearings in the report that it made. It is too bad that Louis Denfeld was permitted to sacrifice, you might say, his career, but he did the Navy and the country a great service. We can thank God that we had a Navy in this Korean conflict because the evacuation at Hungnam will go down as one of the greatest achievements in our military annals. The gallantry and the resourcefulness shown there are without parallel. We need a Navy more today than we ever have.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri in his statement about the great work that the Armed Services Commitee has done. The gentleman knows and I know what a tremendously great country we have and of the great people we have in it. Our people are ready to make any sacrifice for the survival of the country. All they need is to be told the facts and they are with you 100 percent.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, like every Member of the House I am glad today to see this legislation which restores the Navy, and rightfully so, back to the place it formerly occupied. Anyone who has followed our military history knows that a balanced defense made up of three strong arms is vital to the safety of this Nation. In 1949 many of us were alarmed and some of us protested against the planned and attempted demolition of naval aviation and the Marine Corps under the guise of unification. Our old Committee on Naval Affairs, under the able chairmanship of our present distinguished chairman, built up a strong Navy which in the last war contributed momentously to the bringing about of peace and the cessation of hostilities. We witnessed a period in which there was an effort made to relegate that Navy to a role in which its offensive potential was to be stripped from it, and it was to be merely a convoy Navy. The report of the committee, to which the able ranking minority member just referred, called to the attention of the country the danger of that course. With the force of public opinion, the activity of our Committee on Armed Services, and with the importance of our Navy in view of its activities in Korea, still strongly impressed in the minds of the American people today, we are again on the road to reestablishing a strong, aggressive Navy, with an air arm of proven effectiveness—the type of Navy that is vital to the safety of this country.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that the gentleman from Indiana, a brand new Member making his first speech, emphasized that we do not want to forget—and with all of our desire, in which I join and I know all of the other Members join, to fully fortify our defenses we just cannot put our own judgment aside for everything just because it is put up to us in the Congress on a defense basis. We have to ask some questions and we ought to have a complete record on what we are trying to do. What the gentleman from Indiana emphasized is that this business is not just a matter of building an aircraft carried. That is perhaps the lesser expense. It is like lots of things in life; it is not the original cost but it is the maintenance that comes high. What he pointed out was that a carrier needs protection; a carrier needs continuous supply; it needs aircraft and this is very important, that carriers are vulnerable. We heard great debate about that fact, and let us again emphasize what he said, which is very true, that this operation in Korea demonstrates that where we fill a world role we have to perform many military responsibilities like those in Korea, which do not represent the kind of full-scale war which we would have to wage if we took on a first-class military power like the only one that is threatening today, the Soviet Union. We are waging a very different kind of war in Korea than we otherwise would if we were in a world war. The primary question of enemy capability in the air alone would make a significant difference.

The question that I would like to address to the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services is this—and I join with all my colleagues in my deep respect for him—Can the chairman tell us what the strategic mission of the Navy is insofar as it can be made public that justifies this carrier? May I just amplify that question in this way: We always understood and like other Members in the House I went to the Command and General Staff School at Leavenworth, and I have a certain amount of military knowledge, that the classical role of the aircraft carrier was attack on enemy ships and support of aviation in connection with amphibious missions. The question I want to ask is: What is the role of the Navy in strategic bombing which justifies this enormous expense for a new supercarrier which the gentleman from Indiana has properly emphasized, and which justifies us in passing this bill in this fashion?

Mr. VINSON. I will say to the gentleman from New York that one of the justifications is to always have an airplane carrier that can accommodate the expansion and the development in aviation. As naval aviation, particularly jet aviation, develops, we have need for longer and stronger carrier decks. Progress in one demands comparable progress in the other. The construction of this carrier will give the Navy a prototype which will enable it to thoroughly service test any aircraft which will be available to it in the foreseeable future.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the gentleman tell us what has been told to the committee, what the committee can tell the public, as to the role of the Navy in strategic bombing? Does the Navy have a strategic bombing role and, if so, what is it?

Mr. VINSON. The Navy does not have the primary role of strategic bombing. That primary role is assigned, by agreement, to the Air Force. The construction of this ship does not in the slightest degree interfere with the primary roles and missions of the Department of the Air.

Mr. JAVITS. We are then to understand, and the chairman will correct me if I am incorrect, that this is a secondary bombing role which the Air Force agrees, which the Joint Chiefs of Staff agree, and which our military authorities agree, it is necessary to vest in the Navy?

Mr. VINSON. I do not think that any one branch of the armed services should have a monopoly of the use of any particular weapon. I think, that if we can develop atomic weapons that the artillery can use, that the Army should have the privilege of using them.

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman does agree with me, though, that both the Air Force and the Joint Chiefs of Staff have agreed that the effort this supercarrier has the capability of mounting shall be part of the Navy mission?

Mr. VINSON. They have agreed that this ship shall be built, and this ship will be used to take care of the development of the aircraft.

Mr. JAVITS. So that when we pass the bill we pass it in response to a completely agreed upon armed services need?

Mr. VINSON. Approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Was the gentleman aware when the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 was passed that there was slipped into that act a provision by which the President of the United States could peddle our combat warships all over the world?

Mr. JAVITS. May I say to the gentleman that I did not recall that anything was slipped into the act. The act was very carefully analyzed and very carefully drawn. When the gentleman from Georgia alluded to this act I called a page and sent for a copy of the act to study it in order to determine just exactly what it did do. I did not have it fresh in my mind. I will go to the gentleman's table and read it. But I am confident—and I can say this as a responsible person in the Congress, regardless of what committee one belongs to—there was nothing in the act that was slipped in or slipped by. It was analyzed, it was discussed on the floor, and it was debated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] has just said that he himself raised the question with respect to this provision.

An analysis of title IV of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act shows by section 401 that the President could transfer no naval vessel out of military stocks if—

The Secretary of Defense, after consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, determines that such transfer would be detrimental to the national security of the United States, or—is needed by the Reserve components of the Armed Forces to meet their training requirements.

The equipment—

Considering the character of the Defense Secretary and his experience, considering also the confidence of the Congress in the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I can certainly understand the acceptability of this provision within the context of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act. I do not see that this should prevent the House from now recalling this power with respect to naval vessels, but I certainly do not see how it can be called a provision slipped by when the power is provided to be so carefully checked.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat puzzled as to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who seems to be speaking for the Air Force, was trying to get at, no doubt because of my ignorance of military procedure. I just want to ask the gentleman from Georgia, in a situation such as they have over there in Korea, such as we had a few days ago when these men were fighting with their backs to the sea, does it make any practical difference, at least to them, whether the Navy or the Air Corps comes to their rescue?

Mr. VINSON. It does not.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I did not think it did.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman has not forgotten that last summer our ground forces in Korea begged for tactical air support which in plain words is nothing more than close air support for ground troops.

It was the Navy and the Marines who furnished this close air support and the reason they did not furnish more was because they were short of carriers, due to the fact the carriers were in moth balls. Now, air support for the ground troops is being furnished by the Air Force as well as the Navy and Marines. But the fact remains that last summer we were short of carriers, which is one of the many reasons why the 57,000-ton carrier in this bill is urgently needed.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The President is authorized to convert not to exceed 1,000,000 tons of existing naval vessels, from among those vessels on the Navy list determined to be best fitted for conversion, to modern naval vessels, of the following categories and subcategories:

(a) Combatant vessels, 980,000 tons, divided into:

1. Warships, 990,000 tons.

2. Mine-warfare vessels, 10,000 tons.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 14, strike out "980,000" and insert "1,000,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for the construction, acquisition, or conversion of the foregoing vessels.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand an article from the January 16 issue of the New York Times in which I have found shocking statements attributed to one of our leading Air Force generals, and which jars my faith in our military leadership.

This article is based on a purported interview with Maj. Gen. Emmett (Rosie) O'Donnell, commander of our Far East Air Force Bombing Command, who is being transferred to the Strategic 15th Air Force at March Field, Calif.

General O'Donnell is quoted as having said:

> The Air Force now is worried about some of the opinions held on the effect of bombs on limited targets, especially troop concentrations. We would kill a hell of a lot of them (Chinese Communists) if they would concentrate * * * the trouble is that they don't concentrate and I don't blame them.

For the past 5 years the Congress and the people of the United States have been propagandized into a false sense of security relative to our Air Force power and how our strategic planners would strike with lightning and devastating blows on any enemy. Our military men have told us that they had it all planned the way they wanted to fight and where they wanted to fight, but something happened in Korea that they apparently just did not think of. The enemy, according to General O'Donnell, wanted to use other methods of fighting and also determine where they wanted to fight. This caught our planners and propagandists off base and now they have the audacity to say that the enemy will not concentrate so we can kill them.

This reminds me of the statement of a southern general during the Civil War to the effect that "We can lick those damn Yankees with cornstalks but they won't fight with cornstalks."

Another quotation from General O'Donnell's interview, which to me is the most tragic and sickening of all, was:

> We have not learned a single important lesson in this war. We picked up a few small pointers or minor techniques and it was excellent training, but that is all.

Now, mind you, Mr. Chairman, that is the statement of one of our leading generals in the United States Air Force, and if it represents the kind of thinking that persists in the Pentagon today, Heaven help us.

Thousands of our boys have died in the blood-stained rice paddies in Korea and General O'Donnell declares that we have not learned a single important lesson in this war. Does General O'Donnell mean to say that unpreparedness and the lack of a properly trained Air Force to support our troops has not been a lesson from which to profit?

The claims by the Pentagon in October and November of 1950 of complete annihilation of the North Korean Army by tree-top bombing, which was followed the next day by an attack by 30,000 Red troops on our forces from the exact spot where the Air Force claimed to have done such staggering damage, apparently did not teach any lesson. To me such an incident in the Korean War was proof that our planning over there was way off base.

It seems imperative to me that this Congress should demand an explanation of such interviews as was given by General O'Donnell. Any high-ranking officers making such stupid statements as are found in General O'Donnell's interview should be brought to an accounting. They should be brought before the Armed Services Committees of the Congress so that we can ascertain why their strategy has proved so unsound militarily in Korea.

Actually, Mr. Chairman, many of our military leaders have become almost untouchables to criticism. They consider criticism by Members of Congress very unpatriotic and their attitude has had the effect of intimidating Members of Congress. Consequently, this seemingly untouchable group has been able to build up a gigantic political machine, backed by huge sums of money, with never a fear that their bungling and grab for power would ever be contested.

The sad part of it all is that the rank and file of the Air Force and Army, from the privates to the sergeants, have had to take the punishment caused by questionable leadership of the generals. These men in the ranks have courageously fought their hearts out, with death always knocking, yet their leaders refuse to learn from their costly mistakes.

We are paying in blood for the errors, the half-baked thinking, the misconceptions, the inaccuracy and half-truths, and, in many cases, the arrogant disregard of sound military planning. Many military errors have been committed in Korea and they should be thoroughly reviewed. Congress should insist on honest and complete answers to the debacle in Korea. If the reputations of some individuals are dulled by an investigation, so be it. It is more important to have ability and efficiency in command of our fighting forces than it is to have high positions occupied by military politicians. Precious blood and lives and our treasured principles are at stake.

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that constructive criticism is always a good thing. As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I agreed fully last year with the report of the committee when we stated that Admiral Denfeld had been treated improperly. There is a great deal of criticism that can be made today. I have listened to the remarks that have been made. Many of those remarks were justified, because they were made by members of this committee. This committee works as a whole from both sides of the aisle. Something was said a moment ago about our military leadership, about some lack of resourceful action on the part of our Air Force, I want to say that I am very much concerned that this apparent lack of confidence that is spreading throughout the country may be a terrible handicap to us in our coordinated effort to get prepared for what we are facing in the future. We cannot change the things that have happened in the past, but we must go forward as a body to help correct those mistakes; to take advantage of these mistakes in the future, to let the Red menace that faces us know that the United States of America is advancing to the defense of freedom, liberty, and civilization as a unit. We need cooperation today more that ever in this country. I say to you I do have confidence in our military leaders today. I disliked very much to see Admiral Denfeld go, but I have been impressed with the ability of Admiral Sherman who has taken his place. Taking into consideration the intense cold and the condition of the weather in Korea, our Air Force and our Air Force leaders have given a very fine account of themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. General O'Donnell was commanding a strategic group of airplanes and they did learn nothing about that particular type of warfare.

As you know from the hearings, we had them use B–29's to support ground troops. They are not built for that use. We were caught unprepared in this way, that we had no adequate tactical air force in being which could go there and support the infantry; that is the situation we were caught in. I think the General meant that they learned no important warfare combat lesson because of the fact that they had the wrong kind of planes for the job they were supposed to do. He is a very fine officer in my opinion.

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. I thank the gentleman.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED.. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman that Admiral Sherman is doing a superlatively good job as Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. I thank the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

The bill now under consideration provides for the construction of a large aircraft carrier and the construction and conversion of other ships. We need this aircraft carrier and the fact that the will of Congress was heretofore frustrated by the cancellation of the construction of the aircraft carrier United States should not prevent us from authorizing today, and later appropriating funds for a large aircraft carrier when we know it is badly needed and we are even more convinced of this need today than when we passed the former bill.

The passage of this bill authorizing the construction of this aircraft carrier is one step forward in the correction of a past mistake, and in the passage of this bill by a unanimous vote, we will give Russia and the world evidence of the fact that we intend to continue to have the greatest Navy in the world, and I predict that in the immediate future we will pass other bills increasing the armed might of the other branches of our Armed Forces sufficiently to where we will be able to successfully resist aggression in those areas which we determine are tenable and which are necessary to be held to preserve our freedom and our liberty.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to query the chairman or some members of the committee. First, as I read the bill, there is no dollar limitation upon this authorization; is that correct?

Mr. VINSON. That is correct.

Mr. SCRIVNER. As we have talked of the 56,000-ton carrier some figure has been used. What is the figure contemplated as the cost of this carrier?

Mr. VINSON. It is estimated that it will cost $235,000,000.

Mr. SCRIVNER. To what point of construction of the carrier does the $235,000,000 take us?

Mr. VINSON. That takes care of the machinery and the hull, but it does not include the aircraft.

Mr. SCRIVNER. It does not include the aircraft and many other accessories?

Mr. VINSON. It at least does not include the aircraft.

Mr. SCRIVNER. So we can expect a greater cost than the figure the gentleman gave us. In addition to that and when this carrier is completed and finally goes to sea, how many auxiliary craft is it expected will be needed to accompany this one vessel?

Mr. VINSON. The same number of ships that are used in a task force now of the types of the Midway or the Essex. The ship will be 1,000 feet long and 225 feet wide. It will have the same screening and the same protection that any of the airplane carriers in the task force have; it will be part and parcel of a task force which oftentimes has three or four airplane carriers in it.

Mr. SCRIVNER. I understand that, but it has not been made clear to many of the members of the committee. Do we have in being those auxiliary accompanying craft?

Mr. VINSON. Yes; we have.

Mr. SCRIVNER. I am interested in this and I am trying to get some definite information.

Mr. VINSON. We have in reserve enough different categories, cruisers, destroyers, mine sweepers, and so forth, to meet the requirements if this ship goes into action.

Mr. SCRIVNER. We hope, of course, that in the event anything breaks out and we need this carrier it will be in the right ocean. In other words, this carrier cannot go through the canal.

Mr. VINSON. That is right; it will have to go around Cape Horn.

Mr. SCRIVNER. In the use of this carrier would our forces be limited by the same type of order that MacArthur is limited by now? Namely, that if they knew of some particular target that should be bombed the Navy would have to wait for some orders of some supreme power such as the United Nations to give them permission?

Mr. VINSON. I cannot answer the gentleman's question. He will realize that that is not a question that would come before the Committee on the Armed Services. He must ask someone else to answer it.

Mr. SCRIVNER. It is a question which comes to everybody's mind, because with hands tied the way MacArthur's have been, no air force could do a real job anywhere.

Mr. VINSON. According to that argument there is no use having aircraft over there at all. I do not agree with that concept.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Of course we should have aircraft there. Perhaps at some time in the future the order will be changed. I understand that England has just completed the construction of a flush-deck carrier. I am wondering if in the consideration of this authorization any information has as yet been received by the committee as to the usability and feasibility of this particular type of carrier?

Mr. VINSON. We have not any information to answer that question.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Are our naval officials all now in complete accord on the feasibility of a flush-deck carrier without any superstructure at all?

Mr. VINSON. There would necessarily have to be a certain type of island on this flush-deck carrier. It will be a small island. It will not be a flush deck in the broad sense that you would say this table is a flush-top table.

Mr. SCRIVNER. There has been some modification in the original plans calling for flush deck?

Mr. VINSON. That is right. They will have a small island.

Mr. SCRIVNER. They are satisfied that the planned island will be sufficient to give them the needed operational ability and there will be no interference with landing or taking off?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I was a little bit disappointed to hear inserted in the RECORD by my good friend and able colleague from Michigan who spoke a while ago a quotation by an Air Force general indicating that we have learned no lessons from Korea and also quoting him to indicate that our Air Force had done less than a magnificent job over there in Korea.

I want to say that I support the present bill wholeheartedly, as I recognize, like anyone else who believes in a well-balanced national defense, that we must have a strong and versatile Navy. I think the Navy has done a magnificent job in Korea and off the coast of Korea. It performed a magnificent job in evacuating troops from the northern part of Korea, then landing them down in the southern part of Korea. It had a real problem to contend with when they carried out that difficult operation.

I have talked to the men who came back from Korea and they uniformly agree that the Air Force likewise has been doing a magnificent job over there. It has done a great job. At times I do not believe we could have kept men in Korea without the backing of our Air Force working 24 hours a day. If I have any thought I want to get over today to this House it is that unification is working in Korea. We have three great branches of service over there, the Army, Navy, the Air Force and, of course, the fighting marines, which are under the Navy. They are all working together as a great team and they are all doing a magnificent job.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHAFER. I hope the gentleman did not construe my remarks as a criticism of the Air Corps. My remarks were to criticize a lot of stupid statements being made by generals in interviews and so forth, and also, if I had been permitted to finish my remarks, I would have pointed out that some promotions that are being made should be based on merit rather than upon politics down in the Pentagon Building. That is what I mean to bring out.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the gentleman for his statement. I felt sure that the gentleman wanted to praise the armed services in the Far East as a unit. I am critical however of the remarks made by the general officer to whom the gentleman from Michigan referred; I am very critical of that fact because I think unification is working over there in Korea today, and I think all branches of the service are doing a fine job under most adverse conditions. I know that the Navy and Air Force have a different type of role to perform than that of the Ground Forces. I know that we have no opposition from the enemy in the air and we have no opposition on the high seas, that the opposition is on the land, and the Ground Forces have done the real job of carrying the heavy burden of the load, supported by the Navy and the Air Force at the present time. In the supporting roles, the Navy and the Air Force are doing equally a great job and are entitled to recognition likewise with the Army for a magnificent role in Korea today.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, or the provisions of any other law, no battleship, carrier, cruiser, destroyer, or submarine of the United States which has not been stricken from the Navy Register as provided by section 2 of the act of August 5, 1882 (22 Stat. 296), as amended, or any interest of the United States in any such vessel, shall hereafter be sold, transferred, or otherwise disposed of unless authorized hereafter by the Congress.

SEC. 5. The balance of tonnage authorizations remaining in the following acts are hereby rescinded:

(a) The act of December 17, 1943 (Public Law 204, 78th Cong.).

(b) The act of July 9, 1942 (Public Law 665, 77th Cong.).

(c) The act of May 24, 1941 (Public Law 72, 77th Cong.) as amended by the act of December 17, 1941 (Public Law 353, 77th Cong.).

(d) The act of May 26, 1943 (Public Law 61, 78th Cong.).

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MILLS] having assumed the Chair, Mr. RAINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1001) to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 366, nays 0, not voting 68, as follows:

MEMBERS OF COMMISSION ON RENOVATION OF THE EXECUTIVE MANSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 40, Eighty-first Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the Commission on Renovation of the Executive Mansion the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. RABAUT, Michigan; Mr. MCGREGOR, Ohio.

AMENDING CHAPTER 26 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 73, amending chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end of subchapter E a new section designated 3183 to read as follows:

"SEC. 3183. National emergency transfers of distilled spirits.

"(a) Transfers permitted: under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, distilled spirits of any proof including alcohol (the term 'distilled spirits' or 'spirits' as hereinafter used in this section shall include alcohol) may be removed in bond in approved containers and pipelines from any registered distillery including a registered fruit distillery (such registered distillery and registered fruit distillery hereinafter referred to as 'distillery'), internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse to any distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse for redistillation, or storage, or any other purpose deemed necessary to meet the requirements of the national defense: Provided, That any such distilled spirits may be stored in approved tanks in, or constituting a part of, any internal revenue bonded warehouse or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse: Provided further, That any such distilled spirits removed to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse may be withdrawn therefrom if of a proof of 160 degrees or more for any tax-free purpose, or upon payment of tax for any purpose, authorized by part II of subchapter C; and any such distilled spirits removed to a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse may be withdrawn therefrom if of a proof of 160 degrees or more for any tax-free purpose authorized by part II of subchapter C or for any purpose authorized in the case of like spirits produced at a distillery: Provided further, That any such distilled spirits, upon removal from a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse for transfer to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse or for any tax-free purpose authorized by part II of subchapter C, shall be subject to the provisions of part II of subchapter C: Provided further, That when any distilled spirits are removed under the provisions of this section to a distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse, the tax liability of the proprietor of the distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse from which the spirits are removed, and the liens on such distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse, shall cease; and at and from the time the distilled spirits leave the distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse the tax shall be the liability of the proprietor of, and the liens shall be transferred to the premises of, the distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse to which the distilled spirits are transferred: Provided further, That when any distilled spirits are removed under the provisions of this section to an internal revenue bonded warehouse the proprietor of such warehouse shall be primarily liable for the tax on the spirits at and from the time the spirits leave the premises from which transferred: Provided further, That the provisions of section 2901 of the Internal Revenue Code shall apply in respect of losses of any distilled spirits transferred, or removed for transfer, under this section to a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse; and the provisions of section 3113 of the code shall apply in respect of losses of any distilled spirits transferred, or removed for transfer, under this section to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse: And provided further, That sections 2836, 2800 (a) (5), and 3250 (f) of the Internal Revenue Code shall not apply to the redistillation of such spirits at a distillery nor shall section 2780 of the code apply to the removal of such spirits from any distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse.

"(b) Exemption from statutory requirements: The Secretary may temporarily exempt proprietors of distilleries, internal revenue bonded warehouses, industrial alcohol plants, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouses from any provision of the internal revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, except those requiring payment of the tax thereon, whenever in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so to meet the requirements of the national defense. Whenever the Secretary shall exercise the authority conferred by this subsection he may prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose which caused him to grant the exemption.

"(c) Termination of section: The authority conferred upon the Secretary by this section shall expire 5 years from the date of enactment of this section."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD in explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 73 would permit the use of beverage spirits in the synthetic rubber program and other phases of the National Preparedness Program, and would provide for appropriate safeguards and controls for the withdrawal and movement of such alcohol under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The authority conferred is similar to emergency legislation in effect during World War II.

The legislation has the support of all interested departments in the executive branch of the Government and received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means. Identical legislation was passed unanimously by the House late in the Eighty-first Congress but failed of passage in the Senate because of insufficient time for its consideration.

DETAILED EXPLANATION

The emergency provisions of chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code (sec. 2883 (c), (d), and (e)), which were enacted early in 1942 and which permitted, during World War II, the utilization for industrial purposes of distilled spirits produced at beverage distilleries, were repealed by Public Law No. 448, approved February 21, 1950. It is again necessary to make available distilled spirits produced at beverage distilleries for industrial use in the defense effort, under internal-revenue safeguard.

Under section 3331 of the Internal Revenue Code, the Government may withdraw and is presently withdrawing beverage distilled spirits for emergency industrial use. However, this section of the law makes no provision for the transportation in bond, storage, denaturization, or distillation of such spirits under internal-revenue supervision, after withdrawal free of tax for governmental purposes. This joint resolution would restore, with minor modifications found desirable as a result of experience during World War II, the emergency provisions formerly contained in subsections (c), (d), and (e) of section 2883 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Subsection (a) of this joint resolution would accomplish the following:

First. Permit the removal of distilled spirits from registered distilleries, internal-revenue bonded warehouses, industrial-alcohol plants, and industrial-alcohol bonded warehouses, to any other such facility for any purpose deemed necessary to meet the requirements of the national defense;

Second. Permit the storage of distilled spirits in approved tanks in any bonded warehouse;

Third. Permit the withdrawal of distilled spirits of 160 degrees of proof or more from a distillery, industrial-alcohol plant, or bonded warehouse for any tax-free purpose authorized by sections 3100 to 3126, inclusive, of chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code;

Fourth. Permit the transfer of tax liability and tax liens where distilled spirits are removed under the provisions of the section from one plant or warehouse to another plant or warehouse;

Fifth. Make applicable the provisions of sections 2901 and 3113 (relating to losses and tax refunds for leakage or evaporation) in respect of losses of any distilled spirits transferred or removed for transfer under the subsection; and Sixth. Make inapplicable section 2836, which restricts hours for distilling, and sections 2800 (a) (5) and 3250 (f), relating to the rectification of spirits, in respect of redistillation of such spirits at a distillery. It would also make inapplicable section 2870, which prohibits the removal of spirits from any distillery or bonded warehouse at any time except during daylight hours.

Subsection (b) of the proposed new section 3183 would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury temporarily to exempt proprietors of distilleries, internal-revenue bonded warehouses, industrial-alcohol plants, or industrial-alcohol bonded warehouses from any provision of the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, except to require the payment of tax thereon, whenever in his judgment it is deemed necessary to do so to meet the requirements of the national defense. This subsection (b) is the only significant difference between this joint resolution and the provisions of former section 2883 (c), (d), and (e). The only other difference which may be noted is that this joint resolution would permit the transfer to, and storage of, alcohol on distillery or internal-revenue bonded warehouse premises.

Subsection (c) provides that the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the proposed new section shall expire 5 years from the date of enactment of such section.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXEMPTING CERTAIN TEXTILE MACHINES AND PARTS FROM DUTY

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1012) to permit educational, religious, or charitable institutions to import textile machines and parts thereof for instructional purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina as to the extent of the importations that will come in under this bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, this will permit the importation of certain textile machinery by educational, religious, or charitable organizations for their own use only. They will not be imported for any other use or for resale or anything of that kind. A similar bill was passed by the House in the last Congress but failed in the Senate on account of lack of time.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This is a pretty broad bill. As I understand it, there is only one special type of machine not manufactured in this country that will be brought in, is that right?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 1012 would permit the free entry of textile machinery imported by an educational, religious, or charitable organization "for its own use in the instruction of students and not for sale or for any commercial use." Free entry is now provided under existing law for similar articles used for instruction purposes. The legislation is identical with a bill which was unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means and passed the House of Representatives by unanimous consent late in the Eighty-first Congress. This measure, H. R. 1012, has also been unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of title II (the free list) thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"PAR. 1817. Any society or institution incorporated or established solely for educational, religious, or charitable purposes may import free of duty any textile machine or machinery, or part thereof, for its own use in the instruction of students and not for sale or for any commercial use, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GASOLINE TAX DEDUCTION

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 136) allowing the consumer of gasoline to deduct, for income-tax purposes, State taxes on gasoline imposed on the wholesaler and passed on to the consumer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 23 (c) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to deduction of retail sales taxes) is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(3) Gasoline and retail sales taxes: In the case of a tax imposed by any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, upon persons engaged in selling tangible personal property at retail, or upon persons selling gasoline or other motor vehicle fuels either at wholesale or retail, which is measured by the gross sales price or the gross receipts from the sale or which is a stated sum per unit of such property sold, or upon persons engaged in furnishing services at retail, which is measured by the gross receipts for furnishing such services, if the amount of such tax is separately stated, then to the extent that the amount so stated is paid by the consumer (otherwise than in connection with the consumer's trade or business) to his vendor such amount shall be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income of such consumer as if such amount constituted a tax imposed upon and paid by such consumer."

SEC. 2. The amendment made by this act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1948.

With the following committee amendment:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 136 would allow consumers of gasoline a deduction for income-tax purposes for State taxes on gasoline or motor-vehicle fuels imposed at the wholesale level but passed on to consumers. Most States impose taxes on gasoline and other motor fuel at the retail level. Six or seven States, however, impose taxes at the wholesale level which, nevertheless, appear as a separate item in the price paid by the consumer. This bill would merely allow consumers in such States to receive the same deduction for income-tax purposes as consumers in other States.

Identical legislation was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means late in the Eighty-first Congress, at which time the Treasury Department stated it would have no objection to enactment of legislation to accomplish this purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Friday next, and that when the House adjourns on Friday it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR THE BALANCE OF THIS WEEK AND NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader as to the program for the balance of the week and for next week, if possible?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. There is no further legislative program for the remainder of the week. Our purpose in going over until Friday is simply that the Committee on Ways and Means might report the renegotiation bill, and it will not be ready until Friday. That is the reason for going over. There will be no legislative business at all on Friday, so the Members can govern themselves accordingly.

On Tuesday next the renegotiation bill will come up, assuming a rule is reported, which I think probably will. Then I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services that a bill relating to the reorganization of the Air Force is about nearing its completion in committee, and they expect it to be reported out and a rule obtained. That bill will be assigned for Wednesday.

Any other program for next week I am unable to state now, but if any does develop I shall advise the House as far in advance as I possibly can.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I appreciate the information the gentleman has given us.

SMALL DEFENSE PLANTS ACT INTRODUCED—VITAL TO EXISTENCE OF SMALL BUSINESS DURING MOBILIZATION PERIOD

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include certain statements and excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, legislation of the greatest importance to small businessmen throughout the Nation was introduced simultaneously in the Senate and House today by Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, and myself, as chairman of the Small Business Committee of the House.

This legislation is the Small Defense Plants Act of 1951. It is H. R. 1600. Its urgency, as well as its nonpartisan nature, is demonstrated by the fact that every member of both the Senate and House Small Business Committees has given it his endorsement. In the Senate, I understand that all the members of the committee are joining Chairman SPARKMAN as cosponsors of the bill. Several members of the House committee plan to introduce the bill, and all members endorsed it in the committee's final report.

FATE OF SMALL BUSINESS DEPENDS ON THE CONGRESS

It is no exaggeration to say that the fate of thousands of small businesses throughout the Nation hangs on the passage of the Small Defense Plants Act.

At present, the small businessman is holding the short end of the stick when it comes to obtaining scarce materials or equipment, since the large producers are taking care of their own affiliate or subsidiary fabricators first. The small businessman also is handicapped in obtaining defense contracts, since he cannot afford to station representatives at the doors of the Government procurement agencies.

In addition, the small-business man has been placed at a disadvantage by the broad authority given the military departments to negotiate contracts, rather than to advertise for bids. Small business has proved that it can compete with big business on a public-bid basis, but the bulk of negotiated defense contracts has been given to large companies rather than small ones.

I am sure that most of the Members have heard of these problems from small-business men in their own districts. Every day, small-business men from various parts of the Nation have come to the House Small Business Committee, or have been referred there by their Representatives, in search of assistance to enable them to continue in operation.

PRESENT LAWS ARE NOT ADEQUATE

The committee has done what it can, as have the small-business offices which have been set up in the procurement agencies. The unvarnished fact, however, is that under present law, no one has any real authority to give small business an equal opportunity to compete for defense contracts or to obtain scarce materials. The job will not be done unless new legislation is passed.

After extensive study and investigation, the House Small Business Committee has come to the conclusion that the Small Defense Plants Act is the answer to the pressing problems now confronting small business. It is based on the Smaller War Plants Act of World War II, but it embodies a more positive approach. Where the Smaller War Plants Act included permissive clauses, the Small Defense Plants Act has mandatory provisions which assure that action will be taken.

Prompt action by the present Congress will save the day for small-business men throughout the Nation. No more important action can be taken for the preservation of our system of free, competitive enterprise.

The Small Defense Plants Act is discussed in further detail in a joint statement by Senator SPARKMAN and myself which will be inserted in today's RECORD by Senator SPARKMAN. In addition, the final report of the House Small Business Committee includes an analysis of the bill, as introduced in the Eighty-first Congress, and the compelling reasons for its passage. This analysis is part of the section, Small Business and the Mobilization Program, beginning on page 11 of the report. The material on the Small Defense Plants Act runs from page 26 through page 35.

Without objection, I should like to insert this material at this point in the RECORD for the further information of Members:

PROPOSED SMALL DEFENSE PLANTS CORPORATION (H. R. 9243 AND S. 3978)

Under the joint sponsorship of the chairman of this committee and the chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, a bill was introduced to create the Small Defense Plants Corporation and to preserve small-business institutions and free, competitive enterprise. The enacting clause provides that the legislation may be cited as the "Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1950." This bill as introduced follows the general pattern of the Smaller War Plants Corporation Act but with sufficient change in language to make it a more positive instrumentality. Many of the provisions of the SWPC Act were permissive, whereas the proposed Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1950 contains many mandatory provisions designed to more affirmatively aid small business in its participation in the national defense program and to make certain that small business also retains its fair share of essential civilian production.

BACKGROUND OF LEGISLATION—EFFECTIVENESS OF THE SMALLER WAR PLANTS CORPORATION IN WORLD WAR II

The proposed legislation is the result of experience in World War II. This experience is a warning, because the Smaller War Plants Corporation was not set up during the defense period but came at a time when we were in a full-scale and devastating war. The bill was introduced by the present chairman of the committee after all other efforts to effectively mobilize small business had failed and after it had become apparent that small business must have an agency within the Government which could speak and act for all small business. This experience also demonstrated that during a period in which policies are determined and plans inaugurated small business cannot make itself heard at the council tables. This experience justifies the conclusion that the only way to fully mobilize small business is to provide an agency for that purpose. Such an agency provides a rallying point for all small business and enables the Government to utilize our industrial capacity to the fullest extent.

Experience has also taught us that during periods of emergency when the greatest emphasis is on defense mobilization civilian supplies normally furnished by small business cannot be had because of the inequitable distribution of raw materials. There is ample proof that it is necessary to establish an agency within our national defense structure with adequate powers to solve the problems of small business, not only to fully mobilize for the national defense but to safeguard the segment of our economy which, more than any other, exemplifies our free enterprise system. The committee does not take the position that the present bill is the complete answer to all small-business problems in a defense economy, but it is of the opinion that passage of this or similar legislation will be a long step forward.

It was the extreme imbalance of the economic scales in the production program of World War II that finally forced Congress to act. The Smaller War Plants Corporation Act became law on June 11, 1942. This action in behalf of small business was slow in coming and was almost too late. The agency could not really begin to function effectively until early 1944, after the peak years of war production had passed. By this time the pattern of war production had been set. Big business had converted early and extensively from peacetime to wartime production, and small business had played little or no part. With these handicaps the Smaller War Plants Corporation began the job of mobilizing the full potential strength of the Nation's small-business institutions for the war effort.

Once given the chance, small business showed what it could do. Despite every conceivable obstacle, small business manufactured some 30 percent of World War II production. Had there been an effective Smaller War Plants Corporation in the early days of the war, the achievement of small business would have been even more impressive.

The most valuable single activity of the Smaller War Plants Corporation seems to have been the liaison work between small-business men, and procurement agencies for the awarding of prime contracts. The Corporation was able to act effectively as a Washington representative for thousands of small-business men who, on their own, could not afford to maintain a 5- or 10-percenter in residence. The last available figures on number and value of prime contracts awarded with the assistance of the Smaller War Plants Corporation carry through July 1945. These figures are set forth in graphic form in chart III.

A study of chart III readily shows that SWPC got its prime-contracts assistance program under way slowly. Beginning in early 1944, the trend of prime-contract assistance shows increasing momentum until, in 1945, it reached its peak. In the bimonthly period April to May 1945 some 600 prime contracts, valued at $750,000,000 were awarded with SWPC assistance. SWPC actively assisted small plants in obtaining reconversion contracts in addition to war contracts.

The Corporation succeeded to a lesser extent in procuring for small-business men subcontracts from cooperating large prime contractors. When a large prime contractor found that he had to subcontract part of his work, he could contact SWPC and through its offices be put in touch with qualified small manufacturers who had available productive capacity. Chart IV, which follows, is self-explanatory.

The Corporation was also empowered to make direct loans to small business to finance plant and equipment improvement and to supply capital to be used in the manufacture of war or essential civilian supplies. The Corporation could also purchase capital equipment and lease it to small plants holding war contracts. The record of loans to small business is shown on chart V.

The achievement of the Smaller War Plants Corporation is measurable in concrete terms. Despite its slow start, the Corporation succeeded in loaning more than $550,000,000. Losses were insignificant. Almost a billion dollars in subcontracts was obtained by small business through the direct assistance of the Corporation. More than $5,500,000,000 worth of prime contracts was awarded to small business with the assistance of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. These figures show anything but an insignificant achievement. It is clearly indicated by the record that the Smaller War Plants Act and the Corporation created under this act did much to advance the knowledge and understanding of the position of small business in the American economy.

This act also had the effect of focusing attention on our antitrust laws and antitrust law enforcement. In the postwar period the accumulated evidence of the concentration of economic power and the misuse of that power served to illustrate the necessity and the desirability of more effective enforcement of the antitrust laws for the protection of small-business enterprise. The provisions in the Defense Production Act with respect to abrogation of these laws during the present period of mobilization are recent evidence of the desire on the part of the Congress to keep our antitrust laws intact during periods of emergency.

ANALYSIS OF PROVISIONS

No attempt will be made in this analysis to interpret precisely each section and subsection of the proposed Small Business Defense Plants Act; rather, the analysis is intended to delineate the broad objectives intended to be accomplished. Essentially, the bill provides for positive means for small business:

(1) To secure a fair share of Government contracts under the national defense program;

(2) To secure a fair share of scarce materials for essential civilian production;

(3) To be assured fair and equitable treatment when acting as subcontractors;

(4) To obtain loans for expansion and conversion in the interests of the national defense program; and

(5) To achieve full economic and industrial mobilization.

In order to accomplish these major objectives, provision is made for:

(1) The integration of this legislation with the basic legislation: The Defense Production Act of 1950 (sec. 2 (a)).

(2) A revolving fund in the Treasury for the purpose of making loans and acquiring property (sec. 2 (b)).

(3) The appointment of a board of directors to exercise the managerial functions of the Corporation (sec. 2 (c)). This provision is of particular interest to small business because of the qualifications of the members of the board. The board, which is to be composed of 5 directors appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, is to be composed of 2 members who have been engaged exclusively in private small-business enterprise, in industry, or commerce for at least 10 years. The three other directors are to be chosen, one from the ranks of labor, one from the ranks of farmers, and one from the public at large. The foregoing managerial plan should bring together appointees from four groups having the basic small-business-consumer philosophy of free, competitive enterprise at its best.

(4) Banking powers vested in the Corporation to enable it to adequately finance small-business concerns for defense and essential civilian production (sec. 3 (a) and (b)).

(5) The Corporation's entry into contracts with the United States Government for the purpose of furnishing equipment, supplies, or materials to the Government and to arrange for the performance of such contracts through the letting of subcontracts to small-business concerns. This would enable the Small Defense Plants Corporation to act as a Government prime contractor and to sublet to small-business concerns who would act as subcontractors to the Corporation. This very important provision was added to the Smaller War Plants Corporation Act after its original passage and proved to be extremely beneficial to small business. Actually, the SWPC took over very few contracts, but the power was there to do so if necessary and was, in effect, notice to the procuring agencies to award small business a fair proportion of the prime contracts. It is an effective provision by which the end result can be obtained without its being utilized to any appreciable extent (sec. 3).

(6) Authority to coordinate and to determine the means by which the productive capacity of small-business concerns can be most effectively utilized for national defense and essential civilian production. To that end the Corporation would be empowered to consult and cooperate with the appropriate governmental agencies in the issuance of all orders limiting production. Likewise, the bill imposes upon other governmental agencies the duty and responsibility of consulting and cooperating with the Corporation for the accomplishment of the same objectives (sec. 6).

(7) Full mobilization and integration of small business in the national defense program by empowering the Corporation to make or arrange for a complete inventory of all productive facilities of small-business concerns which can be used for defense and essential civilian production. This is a very important provision particularly during a period of partial mobilization. An inventory of small-business concerns has long been on the agenda of the committees and agencies dealing with proposed programs of plant dispersal. The committee is of the opinion that, if a complete inventory of the productive capacity of small business could be made promptly and expeditiously, it would be found that much of our potential productive strength and manpower is already widely dispersed. In many lines of productivity, our strength may possibly be found already adequately dispersed throughout the country, while in other lines the nucleus for expansion away from the concentrated areas would be found existent.

The committee believes that it is of paramount importance to have such an inventory made, not only in order that we may have proper dispersal of our productive capacity but in order that our villages, towns, and cities may retain their full importance in the national community. It is uneconomic and impractical for us as a Nation to draw manpower and materials into highly concentrated areas to the detriment of other geographic areas of our country. We should, and must, have plant dispersal, and it may best be accomplished, and can be accomplished, by the utilization and expansion of existing facilities in every part in our country. The committee is of the opinion that a most constructive approach to the plant-dispersal problem is a complete inventory of small-business productive capacity of all types throughout the United States (sec. 7 (1)).

(8) Obtaining detailed information on subcontracting and the treatment received by subcontractors from Government prime contractors. Provision is also made enabling the Corporation to take appropriate action to insure that subcontractors who are small-business concerns receive fair and equitable prices, conditions, and terms from prime contractors.

This is an important provision for small business because of the concentration of prime contracts in the hands of a relatively few concerns as compared with the total number which could be employed in production for national defense. One of the greatest sources of complaint during and following World War II was the subcontractors who claimed inequitable and unfair treatment at the hands of the prime contractors. Instances of prime contractors' renegotiating and receiving a higher price with no adjustment of subcontract prices were brought to the attention of the committee. If small businesses are to be utilized principally as subcontractors in our national defense program, the committee is of the opinion that it is the duty of the Congress and the Government to insure fair and equitable treatment in the making and performance of subcontracts (sec. 7 (3)).

(9) Necessary action to be taken by the Corporation to provide incentive for small-business concerns to engage in work in the interest of the national defense or in vital civilian production. This incentive may be provided through loans to facilitate conversion of existing plants or by equipping such plants and giving equal opportunity in every respect (sec. 7 (4)).

(10) Determination by the Corporation of which business enterprises within any industry are to be designated "small-business concerns." The committee recognizes that a small concern in the steel industry is vastly different in capitalization, number of persons employed, sales volume, and so forth, than a small concern, for instance, in the tool and die industry. This determination is for the purpose of qualifying small-business concerns for the benefits to be derived under the proposed legislation. This type of determination would be a long step forward in removing the cause of general dissatisfaction with the definitions of small business currently incorporated in the various procurement acts. The procurement agencies presently use that part of the definition pertaining to number of employees in a single business enterprise, including affiliates and subsidiaries, but do not use the other two standards incorporated in the definition. These standards are that the business enterprise must be independently owned and operated and that it is not dominant in an industry (sec. 7 (6)).

(11) Examination by the Corporation of the method of filling orders and the bases for allocating materials when small-business concerns are unable to obtain scarce materials either for national defense or for essential civilian supply. Equipment, materials, and supplies are the lifeblood of small business and are as necessary to their existence, whether in the manufacturing or the distributing trades, as they are to that of big business. The difference is in the arteries of supply.

If allocation of materials, equipment, and supplies is undertaken by the Government under the Defense Production Act, the Corporation is empowered to make studies and recommendations which other agencies must accept. This plan of operation would assure small-business concerns a fair and equitable share of such supplies both for national defense and for essential civilian goods.

(12) A specific course of action rather than a mere policy declaration that a "fair proportion" of all Government purchases shall be placed with small-business concerns. The bill provides that small-business concerns shall receive prime contracts if it is determined by the Corporation and the contracting procurement agency "(1) to be in the interest of mobilizing the Nation's full productive capacity, or (2) to be in the interest of the national defense program" (sec. 8 (a) and (b)).

Sections which have not been mentioned are principally procedural and administrative.

SMALL-BUSINESS MOBILIZATION IMPERILED

The lack of integration of small business in mobilization plans imperils not only small business but mobilization itself. Logistics is defined as "that branch of the military art which embraces the details of the transport, quartering, and supply of troops." A modern military establishment cannot live on the countryside nor set up a forge here and there to mold bullets or to sharpen sabers. The operation of a modern military establishment is the most exacting and skilled business operation in the world today. In the support of our military requirements, every man, woman, and child in the United States is expected to accept his share of the duty and responsibility involved in the mobilization of our total resources. No patriotic citizen questions for a moment the inherent duty freely accepted by the young men and women of our country who serve in the Army, Navy, and Air Force. No one questions for a moment the right of our Government of the people, through their duly elected representatives, to set up agencies and do those things which are necessary to take care of the problem of logistics for our Armed Forces. No one questions the necessity for sacrifice and denial, oftentimes even the necessities of life, on the part of our civilian population in the maintenance of our basic freedoms.

If these things be true, why then is it necessary for this committee or any other committee of the Congress to fight for the rights of small business in the mobilization program? The policy of the Congress with regard to small business has been plainly expressed in procurement and other legislation and more recently in the Defense Production Act. The executive department has accepted that policy as being fundamentally sound and has taken steps to make it effective. In view of these two salient facts, why is it necessary to provide for an additional agency specifically charged with the duty and responsibility of providing an equal opportunity for small business in the mobilization program.

INFORMATION CANNOT SUPPLANT POSITIVE ACTION

The fundamental difficulties lie in two general areas: First, the apparent lack of comprehension on the part of administrative officials in carrying out congressional policy and, secondly, the need for more definite standards by which the policy of Congress may be carried out. The services rendered to small business by the administrative departments and agencies is largely informational in character. Information does not, in and of itself, provide an equal opportunity for small business to participate in the national-defense program or in the supplying of essential civilian needs. It cannot take the place of positive action such as would be provided by the establishment of an agency specifically charged with the responsibility of solving small-business problems.

SMALL-BUSINESS SUPPORT

The committee has received numerous expressions from small-business men all over the country in support of legislation to establish a Small Defense Plants Corporation. Many small-business organizations representing all types of industry and commerce have indicated their interest. The Small Business-Antimonopoly Conference, composed of national organizations representing small business, farmers, labor, and consumers, has urged the passage of the bill to "create the Small Defense Plants Corporation and to preserve small-business institutions and free, competitive enterprise."

UNANIMOUS ENDORSEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE

The committee is fully cognizant of the situation which prevailed prior to passage of the Smaller War Plants Act of 1942. Members of the committee recall the well-nigh impossible situation in which small business found itself during the 2 years prior to Pearl Harbor. The committee realizes that the continued work of the Small Business Committees of the House and Senate during the past 9 years has greatly improved the relationship between the Government and small business and that sincere efforts are being made to solve small-business problems under existing legislation. However, the committee is of the firm opinion that these problems cannot be wholly solved without the establishment of a separate agency with sufficient power and authority to mobilize all small business. It is also essential that small-business concerns do not lose their place in manufacturing and distributing products for civilian use.

The committee concedes that the failure to give adequate consideration to the problems of small business in our present circumstances is not willful neglect. It is due to the fact that many of the problems pressing for a decision must be considered in their entirety. The collateral issues involved must often be brushed aside if the end result is to be obtained. In the absence of the proper tools, equipment, and necessary materials, no manufacturer or processor can make delivery of his products or services. Likewise, the executive departments, without acts of Congress, cannot be expected to carry out the will of the people; therefore, the committee is unanimous in its endorsement of the intent and purpose of the bill introduced by the chairman of this committee to create a Small Defense Plants Corporation.

THE HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS—A RECORD OF SERVICE TO SMALL BUSINESS—NINE YEARS OF EFFORT TO ACHIEVE LASTING RESULTS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, completion of 9 years of service to small business and the public was marked recently by the House Small Business Committee with publication of its final report of activities during the Eighty-first Congress.

The final report, which describes the accomplishments of the committee during the Eighty-first Congress and makes a number of recommendations for future action, demonstrates a continuation of the policies which have motivated the committee since its inception.

The House Small Business Committee was created by House Resolution 294 of the Seventy-seventh Congress. This resolution was introduced on August 12, 1941, and was approved on December 4, 1941—just 3 days before the sneak attack on Pearl Harbor.

The committee began its activity during the tumultuous period of mobilization for World War II. It was a period during which small business, harassed by materials and manpower shortages and handicapped in the obtaining of war contracts, was desperately in need of assistance. Many thousands of small businesses were forced to close their doors during the early World War II years.

The first major task of the Small Business Committee was to attempt to alleviate the critical situation in which small business has been placed. Hearings were held in all sections of the Nation, and more than 400 witnesses testified or submitted statements. Interest in the committee's work was so great that 174 Members of Congress attended the hearings.

As a result of these hearings the Murray-Patman bill, providing for the establishment of the Smaller War Plants Corporation as a part of the War Production Board, was drafted and enacted into law. The Smaller War Plants Corporation materially assisted small business in assuming its rightful place in the war effort, and despite initial handicaps, small businesses manufactured approximately 30 percent of World War II production.

SMALL BUSINESS AGAIN FACES CRISIS

Once again, as in the early World War II period during which the House Small Business Committee was created, American small business is facing a crisis. The months ahead will determine whether small business will be given full opportunity to participate in the mobilization effort, or whether it will be neglected.

The challenge is as great today as it was when the House Small Business Committee was created in 1941. During the present mobilization, civilian production will be curtailed, and materials will be scarce and more costly. Almost certainly, additional restrictions on production will be imposed. As never before, small business needs an advocate in the House—not to obtain special privileges, but to provide the small businessman with equality of opportunity to produce and sell defense articles and essential civilian goods.

These problems are discussed in detail in the final report of the committee. The report discloses that throughout the Eighty-first Congress the committee has made considerable strides in obtaining action of benefit to small business.

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED

An impressive list of committee recommendations has been adopted in whole or in part by the Congress and the executive agencies. These recommendations include:

LEGISLATIVE

First. The amendment to the Economic Cooperation Act to assure small business a fair and proportionate share of procurement in the United States from funds expended for the European recovery program and allied programs.

Second. The passage by the House of a bill increasing fines for violations of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Sherman Act from $5,000 to $50,000.

Third. The passage by the House of a bill to provide for a uniform statute of limitations in treble-damage suits under the antitrust laws and to permit the United States—as a person—to sue for damages because of violations of the antitrust laws.

Fourth. The passage by the Congress of a bill to amend section 7 of the Clayton Act, forbidding acquisition of the assets of a corporation when such acquisition tends to substantially lessen competition and create a monopoly.

Fifth. The elimination of premium payments on contracts for the purchase of Government royalty oil—Public Law 280, Eighty-first Congress, first session.

OTHER RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED

First. The establishment within the Munitions Board of an Office of Small Business. A Small Business Office was established.

Second. The appointment of a civilian with a small-business background as the directing head of the Munitions Board's Small Business Office.

Third. The establishment of a Board of Review by the General Services Administration.

Fourth. Extension of the average time between advertisement of invitations to bid and closing of bids by the Department of Defense and the General Services Administration.

Fifth. The initiation of a program to standardize specifications on items in common use throughout the Government.

Sixth. More prompt notification to successful bidders and more expeditious handling of the ensuing contracts.

Seventh. The program of wide publicity on advertised bid procurement.

Eighth. The initiation of a survey designed to reduce procurement through negotiation, with a corresponding increase in advertised-bid procurement.

Ninth. The program to assure consideration of transportation costs and charges in estimating low bids.

Tenth. The program to assure small business greater participation in negotiated contracts with the Department of Defense.

Eleventh. The successful opposition of the committee to regulation W—Federal Reserve Board—resulting in the reduction of down payments and the lengthening of maximum maturity dates—March 7, 1949—and, finally, abolishment of regulation W on June 30, 1949.

Twelfth. The elimination of unfair competition in the operation of post exchanges and ships' stores, through cooperation with the House Armed Services Committee.

Thirteenth. The elimination, through cooperation with the House Armed Services Committee, of unfair competition in the procurement of officers' uniforms.

Fourteenth. The elimination, through cooperation with the House Armed Services Committee, of unfair competition by the Army in the operation of laundry and dry-cleaning facilities.

Fifteenth. The elimination of unfair competition to small metal-working manufacturers through procurement by certain Government agencies from the Federal Prison Industries, Inc.

Adoption of these recommendations represents real progress in maintaining the vigor of the free enterprise system. Nevertheless, the most crucial period for small business still lies ahead. The committee has made a number of recommendations for further action in the small-business field. They are:

PRESENT RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE

First. The passage of legislation to establish a Small Defense Plants Corporation.

Second. The reappointment of a special assistant for small business to the Secretary of Defense.

Third. The reappointment of a special adviser to the Chairman of the Munitions Board who will also act as the directing head of the Office of Small Business.

Fourth. The establishment of an Office of Small Business in the Munitions Board as distinguished from a "Small Business Office."

Fifth. The appointment of a special assistant for small business to the Administrator of the General Services Administration.

Sixth. The establishement of an Office of Small Business—or Small Business Service—in the General Services Administration.

Seventh. The establishment of an Office of Small Business within the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Eighth. The establishement of an Office of Small Business within the National Security Resources Board.

Ninth. The appointment of a special assistant for small business to the chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Tenth. A continuing investigation, by future House Small Business Committees, of the functional operation of the Federal Trade Commission and the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Eleventh. A realistic revision of the present definition of small business in order that all small business may be included in a meaningful definition.

Twelfth. Refusal of procurement agencies to allow bids to be revised after opening in order to preserve the integrity of competitive bidding.

Thirteenth. A broadened scope of investigation of Government procurement operations by successor House Small Business Committees.

SMALL DEFENSE PLANTS CORPORATION

Outstanding among these recommendations is the proposal that a Small Defense Plants Corporation be established by legislation.

This recommendation initially was embodied in the Small Defense Plants Act, introduced by Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, in the Senate and by myself in the House last July.

The Small Defense Plants Act will be reintroduced during the present Congress. It has been endorsed by the entire membership of the Senate and House Small Business Committees, and has received wide approval among small-business men throughout the Nation.

The bill would set up an independent agency, the Small Defense Plants Corporation, with broader and more positive powers than the Smaller War Plants Corporation of World War II.

The unanimous opinion of the members of the Senate and House Small Business Committees is that present statutes are not adequate to assure small business a square deal in the mobilization period. New legislation must be passed to accomplish this objective. For this reason, the proposal for the creation of a Small Defense Plants Corporation is one of the most important recommendations in the committee's history.

THE PRESERVATION OF RELIGIOUS AND CIVIC LIFE IN OUR NATION

Since its formation, the House Small Business Committee has been working for one fundamental objective—the preservation of the family and civil life of our Nation through the maintenance of a healthy small-business economy. Our smaller towns and cities inevitably will suffer great dislocations if the lion's share of defense and essential civilian production is channeled into large enterprises. On the other hand, if this production is equitably distributed to small as well as big business, our traditional family, civic, and religious values will be preserved in the smaller communities of the Nation.

The problems which brought about the creation of the committee during the World War II mobilization period have returned in full force today.

Their solution will require a positive, intelligent program of action on the part of Congress and the executive agencies. I am confident the challenge will be met.

FTC, ANTITRUST DIVISION INVESTIGATION

In addition to the Final Report the committee also has just issued a study entitled "Antitrust Law Enforcement by the Federal Trade Commission and the Antitrust Division, Department of Justice—A Preliminary Report." The latter report, an outgrowth of an investigation launched by the committee in the fall of 1949, is an attempt to determine the operational weaknesses of the FTC and the Antitrust Division and to make constructive suggestions for improvement. Already this investigation has produced information which should lead to more effective enforcement of the antitrust laws. The investigation is far from complete, and the committee has recommended continuance of the investigation during the present Congress.

It is impossible to give a brief summary of these two reports, since they cover extremely broad fields. However, I should like to list the table of contents of the final report as an illustration of its scope and as an aid to those who may wish to consult it:

HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE—WEEKLY STAFF REPORT TO COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, each week a report is rendered to committee members by the staff on current problems and activities. This is a short one-page report which usually includes five or six succinct paragraphs concerning complaints of small-business men on a variety of subjects, as well as information of general or specific interest to the committee. The weekly report serves to keep the committee aware of the progress of the work and of the problems constantly arising in our economy which affect small business.

These weekly reports to the committee have also been made available to other interested Members of the House and to the press. For the future information of the Members, I include as a part of my remarks copies of the weekly reports for the weeks ending January 6 and January 13, 1951, which follow:

WEEKLY REPORT OF STAFF ACTIVITIES TO COMMITTEE MEMBERS, JANUARY 6, 1951

Committee reports: On January 1 Chairman PATMAN filed the committee's final report (H. Rept. 3237), as required by House Resolution 22, and a report entitled "Antitrust Law Enforcement by the Federal Trade Commission and the Antitrust Division, Department of Justice—A Preliminary Report" (H. Rept. 3236). These reports were released to the public on January 4. Requests to date approximate 3,000 for each document. The final report (110 pages) recounts the committee's activities during the Eighty-first Congress, with particular emphasis on the effect of mobilization on small-business institutions during the past 6 months. The preliminary report on the antitrust law enforcement agencies is best described by quoting a passage from the introduction: "The committee does not present the material in this report as its final conclusions on the monopoly problem. All findings should be viewed as preliminary and tentative. Many important witnesses are still to be heard. Several areas of antitrust administration need considerable additional exploration." The report recommends continued study of the functional operations of these agencies during the Eighty-second Congress.

NPA Office of Small Business: Creation of the Defense Production Administration (DPA) and appointment of NPA Administrator Harrison to head it pose a problem for NPA's OSB. Close contact with OSB since its establishment has convinced the staff that NPA's industry divisions view OSB as an impediment rather than a help. Evidence is plentiful that the OSB is doing its best but lacks authority to make its recommendations effective. Despite these handicaps, E. H. Lane, Special Assistant to the Administrator for Small Business, and his assistants have performed outstanding service, and it is regrettable that cooperation at the industry division level has not been more apparent. The departure of General Harrison probably will further reduce OSB's effectiveness.

Cement: The Big Three have again upped prices in the Lehigh Valley area (10 cents per barrel, bulk; 12 cents per barrel, paper). Philadelphia carlot buyers now pay $3.37 in bulk and $3.68 in paper.

Replacement parts: A representative of the automotive replacement parts rebuilding industry urges prompt action in listing units of this industry for materials for essential civilian production, stating: "Whether or not we have new cars we must still have transportation. America rolls on wheels. Hundreds of thousands of our people depend on the automobile for transportation. These people are the key to our survival and ultimate victory. Transportation must be maintained."

Antitrust: The Supreme Court this week, in ruling on a treble damage case involving maximum resale prices, declared in effect that agreements to fix maximum prices, "no less than those to fix minimum prices, cripple the freedom of traders and thereby restrain their ability to sell in accordance with their own judgment." The Court's decision was unanimous.

WEEKLY REPORT OF STAFF ACTIVITIES TO COMMITTEE MEMBERS, JANUARY 13, 1951

Defense procurement: The Armed Services Procurement Act (Public Law 413, 80th Cong.) contains 17 exemptions under which "contracts may be negotiated * * * without advertising." The most important of these since the declaration of a state of national emergency on December 16 permits negotiation if it is "determined to be necessary in the public interest during the period of a national emergency declared by the President or by the Congress." The directive of the Secretary of Defense issued on December 18 stressed the intent "to spread contracts across industry as widely as possible in order to broaden the scope of the military procurement program," with the comment that "broadening the base will require a wider use of negotiation." In the fiscal year 1950 dollar value of defense purchases under advertised-bid procedure was 27.3 percent of the whole, while negotiated contracts amounted to 72.7 percent. Small business was able to secure approximately 52 percent of defense contracts let by competitive bidding. The picture with respect to negotiated contracts was vastly different. Small business was awarded only 14 percent of the total dollar value of these contracts. Figures for the last half of 1950 undoubtedly will show a sharp decline in advertised-bid purchases with a corresponding increase in negotiated contracts.

Small business: Inquiries from small-business men have greatly increased. Their letters indicate growing scarcity of materials for the manufacture of civilian supplies, particularly metal products. Inability to secure scarce materials has caused small business to seek defense contracts in greater number than at any time since Korea. Rated (DO) orders, small-business men assert, would enable them to keep their plants going.

Subcontracts: Complaints from subcontractors plagued by scarcity of materials bring to light a point which apparently is not generally understood. That is, a subcontractor, in order to secure materials for defense orders, must have a firm contract with a prime contractor. NPA informs the committee it now has representatives at each Commerce Department field office whose sole duty is to secure scarce materials for defense orders. No action is taken by these representatives unless the prime or subcontractor submits authoritative evidence of proper contractual relationships with the Government.

Scrap (iron and steel): NPA Order M-20 governs inventories of iron and steel scrap held by all handlers and producers. Records of receipt, deliveries, inventories, and use are required. All ferrous metals are included, either alloyed or unalloyed, in order to conserve and utilize every possible bit of scrap metal containing iron or steel. Order M-20 should tend to prevent coercive tie-in contracts (weekly report November 25).

Technical training program: The scientific Manpower Advisory Committee of NSRB, composed of 12 men prominent in education, industry, and science, has recommended a policy to insure the training of young scientists, engineers, and others with special skills.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PRESTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Friday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

USE OF GERMAN AND JAPANESE NATIONALS IN OUR ARMED FORCES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, we have just passed by unanimous vote, a bill that will require a substantial number of American boys to man the ships which we have authorized. The number of boys that are used in the naval forces of the United States must be deducted from the total number who might otherwise be available for service in our ground forces as it is impossible to use these same boys in the land forces and in the Navy at the same time. This bill must, therefore, make it even more difficult to supply our Army with all the American boys it would like to have. Our supply of manpower for our land forces is desperately short. If we do nothing to relieve that shortage, this very bill, for which we have all voted, will but make the drafting of 18-year-old boys and of fathers the more likely. There are relatively few Members of this House who want to face either of these alternatives. Nor is it necessary until we have exhausted every other source of manpower.

It seems clear to me that our first step should be to open enlistments in our Army to citizens of other countries, particularly of Germany and of Japan, to serve in their own areas of the world in the defense of their own homes against communism. Why should we not be relieving the strain on American manpower by using the manpower that is available in parts of the world where the greatest military threat is posed? Why should we not give those people a chance to enlist in the American Army? I am not talking about drafting them; I am just suggesting that we should let them enlist in our army—that we should not wait on the creation of any German Army, Japanese Army, or United Nations Army. We need men now in our Army. There are hundreds of thousands of men in Germany and in Japan who want to enlist. Let us take them in.

Surely there is no other way whereby we can get so much help so cheaply or so quickly. Hundreds of thousands of these men are well-trained veterans of past wars who would make the soundest kind of fighting men right now. They do not have to be drafted. They want to eat United States Army food. Let us give them the chance. We do not have to bribe them by giving them American citizenship as we have foolishly assumed in the past. I propose that we use Germans in the defense of Germany and Japanese in the defense of Japan. I do not propose that any of these troops be brought to the United States either now or later. On the other hand, I do propose to make it unnecessary to send so many American boys to Europe and to Japan, and at the same time I propose to strengthen our position in both Europe and Asia.

RESIST COMMUNIST AGGRESSION

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANTAFF. Mr. Speaker, many of the citizens of this country, including myself, are shocked and embittered by the fact that several of the countries to whom we are now, and have been, extending both military and economic aid to resist Communist aggression are still actively trading with the enemy by exporting strategic war materials to Russia, the Chinese Communists, and the satellite countries.

Some have attempted to rationalize this trade by saying that our allies must stockpile strategic materials which can be imported from the Communist bloc.

It hardly makes sense, however, to trade strategic materials with our enemies so that we are better equipped to kill each other. I recognize that much has been done by the United States to curb the export of strategic materials to Russia and China but our attempts to persuade our allies to follow the same action have met with little success.

The Belgians, for example, will export, this year, 64,000 tons of steel products and 18,000 tons of copper, zinc, and other nonferrous metals to Russia, even though such metals are sorely needed in Western Europe. Steel, copper, brass products, tires, and much machinery were exported, during 1960, from Britain to both Hong Kong and Chinese ports. Even today, Britain is transshipping Malayan rubber to Soviet ports.

Recently we were informed of a transaction whereby the French steel industry had negotiated to furnish 450 miles of steel rail to China, which in all probability, would have been used to construct rail lines from the interior of China to Indochina where valiant French forces are bitterly engaged with the Communists. The French Government is to be commended for taking steps to stop this shipment.

In the past year the countries of Western Europe have exported almost a billion dollars' worth of machinery and materials to the Soviet war potential. Numerous reports indicate that extensive trade with the Communist bloc is still being carried on, notwithstanding the provisions of the supplemental appropriation bill adopted by the Eighty-first Congress.

This active trading with the enemy becomes even more shocking when we realize that through our economic aid—through American taxpayers' dollars—we have helped rehabilitate the industrial potential of these same countries. If we expect the American public to fully support the effort of adequately preparing ourselves, and of helping other freedom-loving people resist communism, then we must put a stop to this unscrupulous trade.

It is for this reason that I have today introduced into the House a bill to provide that no economic or financial assistance of any kind whatsoever shall be furnished to any foreign country which permits the exportation of strategic war materials to the Communist bloc.

CONSTRUCTION OF HOSPITALS AND HEALTH CENTERS IN RURAL AMERICA

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, since coming to Congress on January 3, 1949, I have been intensely interested in the construction of hospitals and health centers in rural America, and particularly in the Seventh District of Alabama, which I have the honor to represent here, under the terms of the Hill-Burton hospital construction program.

I am happy to have voted for the Hospital Construction Act amendments of 1949, which greatly liberalized the program. I have supported every appropriation designed to breathe life into this program, and shared the disappointment which many Members of the Congress felt, and which was more widely felt by those areas which had perfected plans for building hospitals and health centers under the terms of the program, when the appropriation for the fiscal year 1951—July 1, 1950, through June 30, 1951—was cut by 50 percent.

When the Hospital Construction Act amendments of 1949 were passed, it was generally agreed that beginning with the fiscal year 1951 that the Congress would appropriate $150,000,000 as the Federal contribution to the hospital building program.

Congress did appropriate $150,000,000 for this purpose for the fiscal year 1951, but shortly before the appropriation bill was passed the Korean war broke out on June 25, 1950, and it then became immediately apparent that the general expenses of our Government would have to be cut in order to build up our defenses and expand our Army, Navy, and Air Force.

Consequently, the Congress, as a part of the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1951, gave to the Bureau of the Budget the right to cut nondefense appropriations by a total of $550,000,000. When I voted to give the Bureau of the Budget the right to cut nondefense appropriations by a total of $550,000,000, it never occurred to me that the Bureau of the Budget would cut the appropriation for hospital construction by more than a small percentage. Instead, the Bureau of the Budget slashed the appropriation for hospital construction by 50 percent, from $150,000,000 to $75,000,000, thereby making up 13½ percent of its total savings of $550,000,000 from the hospital construction appropriation alone.

When I learned that the Bureau of the Budget contemplated cutting the hospital and health center construction funds by 50 percent, I wrote the President of the United States as follows:

SEPTEMBER 29, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was extremely disappointed when I learned that the Bureau of the Budget had slashed 50 percent, or $75,000,000, off of the appropriation for rural hospital construction during this fiscal year.

The question of whether or not this appropriation would be $75,000,000 or $150,000,000 was fought out on the floor of the House, where the Representatives of the American people made it abundantly clear that it was their desire to proceed with the hospital construction program as originally planned in 1949 when the Hospital Construction Act was amended.

In my judgment there is no activity of the Federal Government of more direct benefit to the health of rural America than the hospital-construction program. Local communities were led to believe a year ago when Congress authorized the $150,000,000 for hospital construction this year that the money would be forthcoming, and they in good faith made their plans accordingly.

Now with the danger of another world war facing us, rural hospitals become even more important. In the event of all-out war we can reasonably expect attacks on our large cities, and the surrounding rural hospitals may become the treatment centers for injured persons from our cities.

I sincerely hope that you may see fit to request the Bureau of the Budget to reverse its decision in this matter, and if not, I trust that you may request a supplemental appropriation for rural hospital construction when Congress reconvenes on November 27, 1950.

Thanking you, and with kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

CARL ELLIOTT.

The President's reply to my letter was as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 2, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. ELLIOTT: This will acknowledge your letter of September 29, requesting information about a proposed reduction in the 1951 Federal apportionment for grants-in-aid for hospital construction under the Hill-Burton Act.

As you know, the Congress, in section 1214 of the General Appropriation Act, 1951, directed that:

"Appropriations, reappropriations, contract authorizations, and reauthorizations made by this act, for departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government, shall, without impairing national defense, be reduced in the amount of not less than $550,000,000 through the apportionment procedure provided for in section 1211 of this act."

The budgetary programs of all departments and agencies are now being thoroughly reviewed within the executive branch in order that the reductions required in section 1214 of the General Appropriation Act may be effected.

Prior to the enactment of section 1214, I had already taken steps to review all Federal programs in the construction field which require materials, supplies, and manpower with a view to curtailing or cutting back those projects which do not contribute directly to the national defense or essential civilian requirements. I originally announced this program in my message of July 19 to the Congress on the Korean situation.

In order to meet the reductions directed by the Congress and to save materials, supplies, and manpower for the defense effort, agencies of the executive branch have recently been given target figures to assist them in the execution of their 1951 budgets. The figures furnished agencies are tentative ones only, and no final decisions have been reached on the amount of curtailment for any individual program.

With respect to Hill-Burton Act funds, the Federal Security Agency for planning purposes has been supplied a target figure of $75,000,000 out of the $150,000,000 provided in the General Appropriation Act, 1951, for allotment to the States during the current fiscal year. This amount together with the $91,000,000 still available from 1950 funds would make a total of $166,000,000 available during the current fiscal year, an amount of $49,000,000 in excess of requirements for this program during fiscal year 1950. Approval of this tentative proposal would limit the number of new hospital projects which could be accepted during the current fiscal year but would not necessitate delay or cancellation of any projects which have received final approval of the Surgeon General, Public Health Service, up to this time. You may feel assured that before a final decision is reached every consideration will be given to the importance of this program in relation to other current urgent requirments of the Government.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The 50-percent reduction was made.

In the second supplemental appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1951, we were able to obtain an additional appropriation of $10,000,000 for hospital and health center construction, making a total of $85,000,000 for the fiscal year 1951. Alabama's share of this appropriation amounts to approximately $2,900,000.

Acting under the impression that the total appropriation of $150,000,000 would be made for the fiscal year 1951, hundreds of communities throughout this country made their plans to construct their hospitals.

These plans consisted of obtaining expensive architects' drawings and specifications, the acquisition of building sites, the levy of a 4-mill tax with which to raise the local share of the costs of the project.

When the Congress failed to make the necessary appropriations to meet these plans, the entire program was thrown out of gear, projects were delayed, and many projects were discontinued altogether.

I realize that now while we are faced with the prospects of an all-out war, and while terrible, bloody, hard, cold fighting is going on in Korea that we must do everything within our power to hurriedly build up our Armed Forces, and that we must provide our fighting men with every tool which they need to discharge the obligation which history has placed on their shoulders.

To this end, I personally am willing to make every sacrifice that I may be called upon to make as an individual, and as a Member of Congress, during this emergency. I will vote only for those programs that I feel are justified in the light of the war effort which we must make.

In the over-all picture of building our defenses in preparation for a war, which I fear that Russia and her satellites will shortly force upon us, it seems to me that we can reasonably expect air attacks on our large cities and particularly on those cities which contribute heavily to the manufacture and processing of the necessities of war, such as steel, oil, shipbuilding, aircraft construction, aluminum, and several others.

At least, it seems to me that we must bear in mind that such attacks are a real possibility.

In the event of such attacks then the rural hospitals that surround such areas may well become the treatment centers for the injured persons from our cities. Thus, it is highly desirable, from a defense standpoint, that we continue, at full speed, the hospital-construction program for rural areas, not presently served by hospital facilities. The continued and improved health and medical care of our civilian population is a vital factor in national defense. The construction of badly needed hospitals and health centers is a major factor in maintaining health.

In the Seventh Congressional District of Alabama a 35-bed general hospital is presently under construction at Hamilton, Ala. A 30-bed general hospital will shortly go under construction at Vernon, Ala. A health center is under construction at Cullman, Ala.

Had appropriations for this program not been reduced, as I have outlined, the Blount County Hospital at Oneonta, Ala., the South Pickens County Hospital at Aliceville, the North Pickens County Hospital at Reform, Ala., and the Franklin County Health Center at Russellville would now be under construction.

As it is, these hospitals and this health center have been postponed until the fiscal year 1952, which will begin July 1, 1951, to the great inconvenience of the communities involved, and in the meantime planning expenses have increased and inflation has taken its toll on the value of such construction moneys as the Congress may, in the future, provide.

As a part of my remarks, I am including a letter from Mr. Clay H. Dean, director, hospital planning division, department of public health, Montgomery, Ala., addressed to me on November 8, 1950, together with tables showing the status of the various hospital and health-center construction in Alabama, together with a narrative report dealing with some of those projects:

STATE OF ALABAMA,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Montgomery, Ala., November 8, 1950.

The Honorable CARL ELLIOTT,
United States Congressman,
Jasper, Ala.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ELLIOTT: Being aware of your interest in the Hill-Burton hospital-construction program here in Alabama and elsewhere in the Nation, we are taking this opportunity to forward you our latest summary of projects. This summary outlines in detail the current status of each project and the effect of the recent 50-percent cut in Hill-Burton funds. Copies of this information have been forwarded to the Public Health Service at their request. We sincerely hope that this data, together with other data furnished by this office, will be of some assistance to you in your efforts to achieve a restoration of these badly needed funds.

Respectfully,

CLAY H. DEAN,
Director, Hospital Planning Division.

NATIONAL HOSPITAL PROGRAM UNDER THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT (TITLE VI) AS AMENDED—NARRATIVE REPORT OF PROJECTS ORIGINALLY PROGRAMED FOR 1950 OR 1951 BUT POSTPONED OR ABANDONED BY REASON OF CURTAILMENT OF 1951 CONTRACT AUTHORIZATION

GENERAL

All anticipated approval dates are based on the 50 percent contract authorization for the fiscal year 1951 and similar reductions in future fiscal years. Should the 1951 appropriation be restored and/or full appropriations maintained in the future, individual projects will be moved forward on the construction schedule insofar as funds permit.

The greater percentage of the general hospitals scheduled for current and future construction in Alabama are to be located in counties with no existing facilities and with few physicians. It is the belief of all, that, with the construction of hospital facilities, physicians will be attracted to the communities, thereby insuring adequate medical attention for the people. This has already been the case in communities where hospital facilities have been constructed.

I. Projects approved by Public Health Service (part 1)

Alabama, 23—Blount County Hospital, Oneonta, Ala.:

This facility is to be owned and operated by the Blount County Hospital Board, a public corporation under the laws of Alabama, and an agency of Blount County. Application for Federal assistance was filed with the State agency December 12, 1947. Blount County has an A priority under the State hospital plan first approved in 1947 and in subsequent revisions. The proposed facility is to be a 30-bed general hospital.

The site is owned by the county hospital board. The city of Oneonta and Blount County have agreed to install all off-site improvements such as water extensions, sewer extensions, and paved streets.

The working drawings have been completed and the final architectural review secured. The architect is now complying with the Public Health Service and State agency comments. The project could be advertised for bids at any time.

It is estimated that the project will cost $360,000, of which $240,000 is to come from Federal funds. Of the remaining funds needed, $60,000 has been allocated by the Alabama State Board of Health. The local funds in the amount of $80,000 are now available from a special 4-mill hospital tax approved by the voters of Blount County last year. The proceeds from this tax can only be used to build and maintain public hospitals in the county.

This project was scheduled for construction from the 1950 fiscal year funds and could start immediately. Due to the cut this project must be delayed until the 1952 fiscal year.

Alabama, 31—South Pickens County Hospital, Aliceville, Ala.; Alabama, 44; North Pickens County Hospital, Reform, Ala.:

These facilities are to be owned and operated by the Pickens County Hospital Association, an agency of Pickens County and incorporated under the laws of Alabama. Applications for Federal assistance were filed with the State agency on October 6, 1949. Pickens County has an "A" priority on Federal funds in that there are no hospital beds within the county. The nearest hospitals are in Tuscaloosa, Ala., and Columbus, Miss., both about 40 miles from the center of the county. The proposed facilities are 20-bed general hospitals and will be jointly operated by the hospital association. In an effort to secure both good design and administration the association has employed an experienced hospital administrator to assist in the design and to manage the hospitals upon completion.

Both sites are now owned by the hospital association and cost $6,500. The towns of Aliceville and Reform and Pickens County have agreed to provide all necessary off-site improvements and some grading on the site proper. In several instances contracts have been awarded for this work.

The working drawings for both projects have been completed and approved by the Public Health Service and the State agency. These projects could be advertised for bids at any time.

It is estimated that each project will cost $265,000 for a total of $530,000. Of this $348,000 will come from Federal funds, $60,000 from State funds and $122,000 from a special four-mill hospital approved by the voters of Pickens County last year.

These projects were scheduled for construction from 1950 funds and could start immediately. Due to the cut in 1951 funds these projects must be delayed until 1952.

Alabama 51, Madison County Public Health Center, Huntsville, Ala.: This facility is jointly sponsored by the city of Huntsville and Madison County. The application for Federal assistance was filed on April 15, 1949. This project has an A priority, as is true of all public-health centers in Alabama. The existing health center is on the second and third floors of an old, nonfireproof theater building. Its facilities are grossly inadequate for the service that is, and could be, performed in Madison County. In addition to the normal population of the county the Redstone Arsenal has been activated thus bringing additional people to the area and increasing the workload of the county health department. Only by the construction of the new health center can both the normal and additional workload be adequately handled.

The site is now owned by the sponsors and is valued at $20,000.

The architect has carried the working drawings to about 95 percent completion. The State agency has made an informal review and the drawings should be ready for presentation to the Public Health Service within a few weeks. The project could be advertised for bids within a month.

The estimated cost of the project is $120,000. Of this amount $80,000 is needed from Federal funds. The State has allocated $20,000 and the city of Huntsville and Madison County have appropriated $10,000 each.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1950 funds. It is now delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 47—St. Margaret's Hospital, Montgomery, Ala.:

This project is for a 262-bed general hospital to replace a nonacceptable, dangerous facility in Montgomery. The existing facility is a definite fire hazard. The Sisters of Charity are the project sponsors. This facility is vital to the planned coordinate hospital system as it has been designated as the base hospital for the central Alabama area. It will provide all types of medical, surgical, and hospital care as well as training facilities for nurses and medical interns. For these reasons it has been given an "A" priority on Federal funds.

The site is now owned by the sponsors and is valued at $150,000.

The working drawings are well over half completed. This project could be advertised for bids within 3 months.

The estimated cost of the project is $3,000,000, of which the sponsors now have their funds in cash. No State funds can be allocated to this project.

This project was scheduled for construction from the 1950 appropriation. It now must be delayed until the 1953 fiscal year. The fact that the Federal share will closely approximate the 50-percent Federal allocation to Alabama complicates this project. It may be that, to avoid disastrous criticism of the hospital program, it will be necessary to postpone even further this project and to allocate the available Federal funds to tax-supported facilities. However, with the full appropriation, St. Margaret's and a number of smaller facilities could be constructed concurrently.

II. Pending projects (programed by State but not yet approved by the Public Health Service)

Alabama, 30—Washington County Hospital, Chatom, Ala.:

This facility is to be owned and operated by the Washington County Hospital Association. The application for Federal assistance was filed April 8, 1948. Washington County has been given an "A" priority on Federal funds since there are no hospital beds in the county. The nearest hospital beds are in Mobile, 60 miles away, and Grove Hill, 35 miles from Chatom.

This site is now owned by the Washington County Hospital Association and is valued at $5,000. The town of Chatom has spent considerable funds extending the water mains to the hospital site.

The architect is now working on the schematic drawings which could be submitted for approval within a few weeks. The project could be advertised for bids within 5 months.

Of the $240,000 the project is estimated to cost, $160,000 is to come from Federal funds, $40,000 from State funds and $40,000 from local sources. Washington County has appropriated this latter amount and now has the funds in cash.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds. It must now be delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 32—Conecuh County Hospital, Evergreen, Ala.:

This 30-bed general hospital is to be owned and operated by the Conecuh County Hospital Association. The application for Federal assistance was filed December 14, 1948. The county has an "A" priority since there are no acceptable beds in the county.

The site is now owned by the hospital association and was purchased at a cost of $5,000. The city of Evergreen has agreed to perform the off-site improvements as extending water mains and paving adjacent streets.

Schematic drawings have been completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. Working drawings could be completed within 4 months.

Of the non-Federal share of $110,000, one-half is to come from State and local sources. The voters of Conecuh County approved a 4-mill hospital tax last year. This tax is now being collected for hospital construction and operation. The total project cost is estimated to be $330,000.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds. It must now be delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 46—Brian Whitfield Memorial Hospital, Demopolis, Ala.:

This 24-bed general hospital is to be owned and operated by the city of Demopolis. Application for Federal assistance was filed with the State agency March 2, 1949. This project has an "A" priority since there are no acceptable hospital beds in Marengo County.

The site is now owned by the city of Demopolis and was purchased for $10,000. The city of Demopolis has employed consulting engineers to plan extension of utilities to the site. An addition access street is also planned.

Schematic drawings have been completed and approved by the Public Health Service. The architect has begun working drawings and could complete them in 2 months.

The total estimated cost is $290,000 with $46,667 from State funds and $186,636 from Federal funds. The city of Demopolis has in cash their funds in the amount of $56,667.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds. It must now be delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 50—Lawrence County Hospital, Moulton, Ala.:

This facility is to be a 40-bed general hospital and is located in a county which now has no hospital facilities. The nearest hospitals are in Decatur and Sheffield, 23 and 40 miles from Moulton. The county has an "A" priority and the facility is to be owned and operated by the Lawrence County Hospital Association. Application for Federal funds was filed with the State agency on September 1, 1949.

The site is now owned by the hospital association and is valued at $3,000. The town of Moulton and Lawrence County have agreed to provide the required utilities.

Schematic drawings have been completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. Working drawings could be completed and the project advertised for bids within 5 months.

The total cost of this project is estimated to be $488,000. Of this amount, the Federal share is $320,000, with the State providing $60,000 and the sponsor $108,000. The local share is now being raised by a 4-mill hospital tax approved by the voters last year. Bonds have been sold and the construction funds are now in a local bank. Operation funds will be provided from the tax and from hospital receipts.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds. It now must be delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 53—Tarrant City Health Center, Tarrant City, Ala.:

This project is to be a public health center to house branch offices and clinics of the Jefferson County Health Department. The present facility is located in an old converted and inadequate frame residence. Application for this "A" priority project was filed by the city of Tarrant City with the State agency on October 27, 1949.

The site, valued at $6,000, has been acquired by the city of Tarrant City. Necessary utilities are now available to the site.

Schematic drawings have ben completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. Working drawings could be completed and placed on the market for bids within 4 months.

The total cost of this project is estimated to be $42,000, with $28,000 from Federal funds and $7,000 from both the State and Tarrant City. The sponsor now has his funds in cash.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds but now must be delayed until 1952.

Alabama, 81—Randolph County Hospital, Roanoke, Ala.:

This 35-bed general hospital is to be owned and operated by the Randolph County Hospital Association. It is to be the central unit in a proposed county hospital system including three smaller units which will be supplementary to the county hospital. Randolph County has an A priority, since there are no acceptable hospital beds in the county. Application for Federal assistance was filed on November 10, 1949.

The site was purchased by the hospital association for $3,000. Utilities are to be provided by the city of Roanoke, which is now making a study of the necessary work.

Schematic drawings have been completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. Working drawings could be completed and the project advertised for bids within 5 months.

It is estimated that this project will cost $423,000, with a Federal share of $230,000. State aid in the amount of $60,000 has been approved for this project. The local share of $83,000 is provided from revenue collected from the 4-mill hospital tax approved by the voters of Randolph County last year. Proceeds from this tax will also be used to supplement hospital revenues for operation funds.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds, but now must be delayed until 1953.

Alabama, 86—Lauderdale County Health Center, Florence, Ala.:

This public health center is to be owned by Lauderdale County, and will house the Lauderdale County Health Department. It will replace the present inadequate facilities utilized by this county agency. This project has an A priority. The recent rapid growth of this area makes adequate public health facilities of this area an urgent necessity. Application for Federal assistance was made to the State agency on December 27, 1949.

The site is owned by Lauderdale County and is valued at $20,000. It is located in the downtown area where public utilities are now available.

Schematic drawings have been completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. The working drawings could be completed and the project placed on the market for bids within 4 months.

It is estimated that the total cost of the facility will be $114,000, not including site costs. The Federal share will be $76,000 and $19,000 has been allocated by the State board of health. The local share of $39,000 is composed of $19,000 in cash and the site.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds but now must be delayed until 1953.

Alabama, 96—Franklin County Health Center, Russellville, Ala.:

This public-health center is to be owned by Franklin County and will house the Franklin County Health Department. It will replace the present inadequate facilities now used by this county agency. This project has an A priority. Application for Federal funds was filed with the State agency on December 30, 1949.

The site has been purchased by Franklin County for $12,000. Utilities are available.

Schematic drawings have been completed and submitted to the Public Health Service for informal review. The working drawings could be completed and the project placed on the market for bids within 4 months.

The total cost of this facility is estimated to be $108,000. The Federal share is $72,000 and the State is providing $18,000. Franklin County has in cash their share of $18,000.

This project was scheduled for construction from 1951 funds. It must now be delayed until 1953.

NATIONAL GUARD

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Viking Division of National Guardsmen from Minnesota and North Dakota was inducted into Federal service and will leave Sunday for Camp Rucker, Ala. Twice in 10 years Minnesota Guardsmen are leaving their homes, families, and jobs to serve this Nation in time of crisis.

It is not easy for them, nor for their families, but they do so proudly in the tradition of American men, wearing the insignia of the Forty-seventh Viking Division—a Viking helmet on the field of Thor, the mythical god of strength, the great defender and victor in battle. This patch symbolizes the Scandinavian ancestry of many Minnesotans but it is worn by men of all ancestries—the sons and grandsons of the men who built our great State.

We are particularly proud of the men of the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Infantry Regiment of Minnesota. This regiment carries on the tradition of the famous First Minnesota Volunteer Infantry whose charge in the Battle of Gettysburg is still regarded as the most heroic in our military history. This First Minnesota Volunteer Infantry became the first group of volunteers in the Civil War and came from the then youngest State in the Union.

The young volunteers were frontiersmen who had banded together in local militias and their first camp was made only a short distance from this Chamber, on the Capitol Grounds. From here they went on to a brilliant record that reached its peak in the charge of July 2, 1863. This charge bought the time Hancock needed to reinforce his wavering line and saved the Union forces from defeat.

Other units of what is now the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Infantry have existed since territorial days in Minnesota and served in the Civil War, Spanish American War, on the Mexican border, and in both World Wars in France, Africa, and Italy.

This week the men of Minnesota are again reminding us that the strength of a democracy is in its citizen soldiers, in the men who in our hometowns form the heart of our armies in crisis. This is a point we can well recall today.

As Americans we have been rightfully reluctant to build huge military machines. Our aim has been peace and security and a society in which free men can work and raise their families. We have fought and fought well when this goal was threatened. It is again threatened and again we must build our defenses.

But as we begin this grave task, we should remember the service of our citizen soldiers—the men who have gone in time of danger to defend our homes. They are not professional soldiers in the strict sense of that term. But they have defeated the professional armies of those who would destroy the freedom of mankind.

This should be a warning to those who think we must adopt an armed camp mentality in our time and build an enormous military machine to be maintained in peace and war as a kind of professional army. They would have us sacrifice our homes and our freedoms in the very effort to save them. To those, the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Infantry and its history should be a lesson worth remembering.

The citizen soldiers of Minnesota have carried their share of the burden in these times and many of them are leaving their homes for the second time in 10 years. In our district they have trained at Brainerd, Long Prairie, Aitkin, Milaca, Camp Ripley, St. Cloud, Sauk Centre, Princeton, Litchfield, and Park Rapids and have given faithfully of their time as citizens.

We are intensely proud of these men from our district. I know many of them and regret to see them leave but know that in going they will acquit themselves in the best traditions of the Guard. They deserve our support and we express to them our best wishes for an early return to their homes and families.

My reason for calling the attention of the House to the induction of the Forty-seventh Division, gentlemen, is to remind all of us of our responsibility to these men and to their families. Let their going not be taken lightly for they are going in our cause—the cause of the American people.

To those who go we have a grave obligation—an obligation to them both as soldiers and as citizens. As soldiers we owe them every honest effort that we can make to achieve a just peace without the terrible suffering of war. We owe them the best of our resources so that they will be the best trained and equipped men in the world.

As citizens, we owe them fair treatment of their families. To emphasize this obligation in plain terms, I want to include here an editorial by Chuck Rathe, editor of the Sauk Centre Herald:

The call-up of the National Guard here into Federal service has rekindled fire again under an old problem when democratic armies fight, for democratic armies are citizen soldiers—at least as they go in. They have obligations of citizenship and family quite beyond those of the professional soldier.

What is pointed up here is that dependence allotments for men with families are too low. In some cases this will create hardships. Fortunately, at the moment in the Guard most of the men with families are in the upper pay grades where they'll be able to implement the incomes for their families.

Total payment to a wife of a serviceman is $85 per month, including the contribution made by the husband from his Army pay. This might be sufficient for young working wives, but the $105 available to a family with one child and the $125 a month to a wife with two children is way out of line. No extra payments are made for more than three dependents.

Wives with children can't hold down good paying jobs without upsetting routines at home and running into actually more costs of home management. Besides that, if the Army is really interested in the morale of its fighting men—and if in that group it is going to include family heads—then Congress and the rest of us had better see to it that the family left behind is adequately taken care of. A soldier can't fight intelligently worrying about whether his wife and kids are getting along on pittances.

The people of the United States might just as well begin now digging down into their pockets to maintain a fighting force of men, and one of the places to dig is to sustain their families adequately enough so that family life doesn't disintegrate under the stress of things.

We could win wars until doomsday, but we will have lost everything if we are to break family morale and ultimately the American home with parsimony.

These are some of the obligations that must be met. We are proud of our National Guard men and we are grateful to them. This means we must fulfill the responsibility we have to citizens who in time of danger become our soldiers. We owe them these things and we owe them more—we owe them our prayers for guidance to peace based upon principles of Christian justice. We must bow humbly and ask for divine guidance in the task before us. We must seek the way in the only place man has an abiding faith—in the leadership of God.

RICE PRODUCTION

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, our struggle against the forces of communism throughout the world involves many aspects of our own economic policy. We cannot afford to overlook a single one of these policies which might conceivably improve our position of influence as arrayed against the Communists.

Rice is the major food crop for most of Asia. If we can assure the Asiatic people of a sufficient supply of this food, we have established a tremendous bargaining power. We will have a valuable weapon for economic rehabilitation in these areas where empty stomachs have become a persuasive weapon of communism.

The countries which in the recent past have been furnishing virtually all of the Asiatic rice imports are Thailand, Burma, and Indochina. Can we take the gamble that the present tide of totalitarianism will leave them undisturbed, continuing to contribute a normal supply of rice to the world market? It would be folly to entertain such complacency. I am informed that intelligence reports continue to point up the imminent possibility of advances by the Chinese Communists into the Malay Peninsula. Even if these countries are not openly attacked, we have no assurance that internal disturbances will not violently disrupt agricultural production. This has already been the case in Indochina.

What can we do to assure ourselves of a sufficient supply of rice to meet our needs at home, the demands of our occupation in Japan, the needs of a reserve supply for the peoples of India, Pakistan, Indonesia, and the other areas hungry for rice?

The one sure answer is sharply increased American production. This can be achieved only by completely removing acreage allotments and marketing quotas for the 1951 crop. Removal must be at an early date, before the end of this month, in order that potential producers can increase their planting program.

The Department of Agriculture has the important decision to make in regard to the continuation of planting restrictions. Prudence dictates that the choice be in favor of expanded production of this important food crop.

America needs a rice reserve primarily to use as a weapon for democracy in Asia, but there is no need for a scarcity of production at home during a time we are attempting to put a brake on all inflationary price trends. Continued restriction of rice production will result in a price mounting considerably higher than parity, more than the consumer should be asked to pay.

I have been informed that the Department of State and the Defense Department have had occasion to check into the status of our rice supply, and that both Departments are concerned over the possibility of shortages developing in the non-Communist world. This foresight is to be commended. I hope the concern will be felt by those who make the decision as to the future of rice production in this country. We must rid ourselves of the concept of normal supply during this period of dire abnormality.

Only four Asiatic countries exported rice to the other countries of Asia in 1949—Burma, Thailand, Indochina, and Formosa. Their total exports were 2,900,000 tons. This country cannot afford to take action the success of which is dependent on the possibility of this normal export continuing in the face of the threat to the peace of southeast Asia. If we fail to prepare ourselves against this eventuality, we will have fallen again into the error of lack of proper foresight which has permeated so much of our Asiatic policy.

I urge the Secretary of Agriculture to take advantage of the authority accorded him under the law and remove all restrictions from rice production.

THE LATE COLONEL HENRY W. STIMSON

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is not a Member of the House who is not familiar with the life and work of the late Colonel Henry W. Stimson.

It is my privilege to announce that memorial services in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of Colonel Stimson, who died on the 22d of October, 1950, at Huntington, Long Island, N. Y., which is in the district which I represent, will be held at the National Presbyterian Church, Connecticut Avenue at N and Eighteenth Streets NW., Washington, D. C., on Sunday afternoon, January 21, at 5 o'clock.

Tribute will be paid by the Honorable George C. Marshall and the Reverend Dr. Albert J. McCartney. A bronze tablet in honor of Colonel Stimson will be unveiled by Mr. Charles W. Albers, vice moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church. All Congressman are invited to these memorial services.

INCREASE RAILWAY RETIREMENT

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced, for the consideration of the Members of the House, H. R. 1313, the purpose of which is to increase the retirement benefits of all railway employees, carrying a relative increase for the widows of railway employees. Because of the high cost of living, present retirement benefits fall far short of what they should be at the present time.

The Railroad Retirement Fund for the payment of such benefits has continued to grow until it has reached almost the $3,000,000,000 mark. Railroad men and their dependents now facing the high cost of living are entitled to relief, and it is my hope that the Congress will give them such relief by passing my bill or similar legislation in this session of the Congress.

The trust fund now reaching nearly three billion dollars is sufficient to carry a very substantial increase to the employees without any additional cost on their part or any additional contributions from the railroad companies.

Mr. Speaker, because of the present high cost of living and the increase the Congress has made in social-security benefits for other workers, many railroad workers in my district have written to me asking that action be taken in Congress to increase their retirement benefits.

After considerable study and work with the best authority I could find here in Washington, I introduced in the last session H. R. 9161 in an effort to secure greater retirement benefits for railroad workers.

This new bill, H. R. 1313, carries the same provisions as the previous bill, H. R. 9161.

Mr. Speaker, we have kept in mind in drafting this legislation that the retirement benefits must not be raised to the point where it would bankrupt or endanger the retirement fund. I feel that the increases provided in this bill are as high as it is safe to go.

The consideration of this bill will bring this urgent problem before the Congress so that hearings may be held, allowing all parties interested to be heard in its consideration, and it may be necessary to modify the proposed legislation under the light of facts developed from the testimony.

Briefly this bill will give the retired workers an increase of from 30 to 33⅓ percent. It will affect the widows in about the same ratio. It does not increase the contributions made by the employees or by railway management. It would give the same increase to those who were retired prior to the passage of the bill.

I hope it may be considered and passed by the House and sent to the Senate early in this session.

Because of the urgent necessity of the benefits so needed by the hundreds of thousands of railway employees, I hope that the proper committee of the House will give serious consideration to such legislation and that it will be favorably reported by such committee at an early date, so that it may be considered and passed by the House and sent to the Senate early in this session.

EIGHT-POINT PROGRAM FOR SURVIVAL

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the time has come to stop, look, and listen. America is heading for danger. Washington needs a shake-up the likes of which has never been experienced before. I propose the following eight-point program for survival:

First. Get the boys out of Korea. This Congress has not declared war. The United Nations is guilty of indecision, vacillation, and pro-Russian action. Other United Nations members have made no sizeable contribution to our fighting forces.

Second. Accept former President Hoover's proposals in reference to arming Western Europe—require European nations to first undertake to defend themselves. At the present time the administration is proposing to spend $8,000,000,000 in Europe and send thousands of our boys there when to date they only have a pledge for one European division from all of Western Europe.

Third. Replace not only Secretary of State Acheson but all top echelon policy-makers and near policy-makers who have supported the pro-Russian policies evidenced in the agreements made at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam as well as other pro-Russian programs carried on by the State Department such as encouragement to the Chinese Communists on the grounds that they were merely agrarian reformers, supporting the Russian viewpoint in reference to Japan and the resistance to the discharge of such men as Alger Hiss.

Fourth. Replace our delegates in the United Nations.

Fifth. Take out the waste, extravagance, and unnecessary spending of the Truman budget. Much of this has no relation to our defense.

Sixth. Halt expansion of the Federal Government by refusing to enact the Fair Deal as urged by President Truman, including Federal aid to education, socialized medicine, the Brannan plan, and other pet Truman schemes.

Seventh. Evidence a spirit of sacrifice on the part of everyone connected with the Government before our citizens are called upon for extreme sacrifices. Increase the work output on the part of every Government employee. Unless we save this country from financial collapse our boys will be defending a hollow mockery.

Eighth. Speed up defense production—contract-letting is lagging. Bungling and inefficiency must end.

UNITED NATIONS, KOREA, AND WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the proposition for peace made to China by the United Nations in order to stop the war is the most abject surrender of anything known in history. To cease fire the Communist Government of China is to be admitted to the UN and Formosa is to be given over to them.

That is all the Communists of China asked in the first place and when we make such an offer, we admit an abject surrender. The Nationalists of China are to be sold out bag and baggage, and turned over for the Communists to execute. Japan is left helpless, the Philippines are without protection. In other words we get in our boats and pull out. If that is done, the United Nations might just as well pay their hotel bills and go home, for the first attempt of the debating society has ended in a surrender dictated by Communist China.

If this plan is followed we should immediately withdraw from the United Nations and we will endeavor to run our own affairs. Russia is now in the United Nations, and we can't come to an understanding with her—Communist China now comes in. Is there any reason to believe that the peace of the world can be established with two obstructionists when we had only one before?

If this is done, the United Nations will be a cringing creature, ready and willing to bargain away any other government at any time. The whole purpose of the UN will thus be destroyed and it will lose the confidence of all nations when a question of policy is applied to that nation. One by one, the UN will transfer all countries to the dictation of Russia.

While I will do everything I can to aid and assist the Government in its joint attempt with the United Nations to prevent aggression in Korea, I will do it because we are already in. The men on the battlefield are not to blame for being there. I am not going to tell the defense forces how to run the Army, Navy, and Air Force for two reasons:

First, I do not know what should be done; and secondly, I am willing to rely on the good sense and military capacity of our own generals and war administrators.

That does not mean, however, that I, as a Member of Congress, will not raise my voice against sending troops to other sections, where we are not engaged in war. I oppose sending troops to Europe because:

First. The western countries of Europe should first show a desire to have us assist them.

Second. They should be alert to their own danger if there is any.

Third. They must do what it is possible for them to do in the way of furnishing materials and men.

Reading in the press that General Eisenhower has found that western Europe has only six divisions ready for action, makes it quite evident that no country is threatening western Europe. Russia alone has 300 divisions and 100 more among her satellites. If there was such a danger, the whole of western Europe could have been overrun since the end of the fighting in World War II. Now if western Europe feels that without further armament, they can proceed without fear of invasion, why should we be so concerned in western Europe?

To stop further entrance of this country into the affairs of the world and embroil us in costly wars, is a right and duty I have to perform, but when our men are actually in a battle, no matter how they got there, I will support them, for in doing so I am supporting my country. My criticism of further embroilment does not constitute a sabotage of our present war effort.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, every thoughtful American is alarmed by what has happened and by what is happening in the field of foreign affairs. He demands, and very properly so, nonpartisan and realistic action from those in authority, in order to insure the security of our country and to bring about peace with honor in the world.

As a Representative from the Second District of Connecticut, I have and shall continue to analyze and consider the problems presently facing all of us on a nonpartisan basis. With the survival of our country at stake, this is clearly the time for all of us to place country ahead of party.

I have come to the conclusion that neither the President of the United States, nor our great and respected former President, Mr. Hoover, is completely realistic in his respective summation of where we are going and what we must do.

There is one point, however, in which I thoroughly agree with both of them. We must take every possible step at once to insure that this Nation shall be as strong as possible, as quickly as possible. All of us must be in agreement and united in this respect.

I certainly concur with those who believe that we cannot expect to defend the entire free world, by ourselves, against Soviet imperialism. If the other free nations wish to survive, they must do their full share of arming and defending and fighting.

The failure to date of the United Nations to recognize and denounce Communist Chinese aggression in Korea; the bloody battles being fought nearly singlehanded by our boys in Korea makes me question seriously the use of the term "United Nations Forces."

I certainly concur with those who say that the United States of America cannot wrap two oceans around it and stay secure, safe, and free. It is the inescapable truth that we are part of this world and must remain that. For us, this must mean that no longer can we say that our first line of defense is on the Atlantic, or on the Rhine, or on any one base or boundary or bastion. My own service in the United States Navy during World War II convinces me that our own defense must comprehend the entire world.

I have some sense of reassurance in the recent comments made to the press by General Eisenhower before taking up his duties as Supreme Commander in Europe. He spoke concerning the prospects for obtaining more effective cooperation from our allies, and for providing through all the nations jointly a military machine strong enough to meet the requirements of the situation in that part of the world.

I regret that while all of the partners in the Atlantic Pact are supposedly preparing to build up a unified defense system against the many and varied threats of Russian aggression, some of the partners are still supplying Russia and Communist China with rubber, tin, wool, and various other materials listed as strategic and critical of our united defense effort.

This policy of business as usual handicaps the efforts of the free nations themselves to build up their own defenses while all the time increasing the military power of our potential enemies.

In my opinion the free nations of the world should unite in a complete embargo against the Communist world. Let us put a stop to doing this kind of business with our enemies.

The North Atlantic Council has created a Defense Production Board to supervise the buying and distribution of strategic materials. This Board should immediately start to direct and control the preclusive buying of strategic materials. It must prevent sales of war-making materials to Russia and her satellites. It must prevent the partners in the North Atlantic Pact from competing with each other for scarce materials. This competitive buying of scarce and critical materials has added billions of dollars to the cost of government.

I share with General Eisenhower in the conviction that unless every sacrifice made by America is matched by equal sacrifice and equal sincerity of purpose in the other nations, our efforts for peace with honor cannot succeeed.

As a Member of the House of Representatives, I will do everything that I can—

First. To strengthen the United States militarily, morally, and spiritually.

Second. To mobilize all of the resources of this Nation to meet fully and swiftly the requirements of the emergency and to see to it that the burden of such mobilization falls as equitably as can be upon all our people.

Third. To oppose any secret commitments to any other nation.

Our unfortunate policies of the past have brought us now to the brink of world-wide disaster. We are entering a long period in which we must subject ourselves to many restrictions which we as a people would not tolerate in more peaceful times.

All of us in every walk of life, in every profession or calling, must ask this question: "Am I going to lead in the scramble for the self-protection of my own special interest, or shall I stand up and dedicate my thinking, my action, and my prayers to the protection of my country?"

Stern policies lie ahead. As a legislator it is my responsibility to insist that these policies be considered carefully in committee and the issues debated freely, fully, and without partisanship on the floor of the House.

Stern policies can be effective only if the public understands fully the reasons why these policies are needed. The people of our Republic have never been afraid of the truth.

The time is now. Our very survival is at stake.

SIDNEY RECORD-ENTERPRISE FURNISHES NEWSPAPER BY AIR MAIL TO GI'S

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand an air-mail edition of the Sidney Record-Enterprise. This newspaper, I believe, is the only weekly newspaper in the country which is now being printed and sent out by air mail to the boys at the front. I think this is a very fine patriotic undertaking. I also received a letter from Mr. McLaughlin, the editor, in which he said:

> I am enclosing the second issue of the regular weekly air-mail edition of the Record-Enterprise. So far as I know, this is the only weekly newspaper anywhere publishing an air-mail edition. This edition is limited to those in the service. It is published by this newspaper free and postage is paid from a fund supported by community organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this enterprise and I feel it would be well if other small-town local newspapers would follow this patriotic example.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from New York has expired.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED SERVICES

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, this morning I introduced a bill to provide income-tax exemptions for members of the Armed Forces serving outside the United States. The bill provides for total exemption for all enlisted personnel and $200 per month for commissioned officers.

There is no reason why the men who are now serving our country overseas should not be given certain tax exemptions somewhat similar to those of the last war. Basically, the same reasons which prompted such legislation then, demand it now.

Members of the House will agree that legislation of this type is the least that a grateful nation can do for those gallant and courageous men who are defending our country in places far removed from their homes and those they love dearly.

I strongly urge the House to take quick action on this measure. It will boost the morale of those who are battling the godless forces of communism for the preservation of our freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and our basic American way of life.

THE SINGLE ITEM VETO OF APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the President has presented us this week with a budget of staggering proportions for the next fiscal year. A tremendous deficit will result, unless drastic steps are taken.

It is imperative that we close the dollar gap between our Federal income and our current expenditures or we shall have an inflation of such magnitude that no amount of Federal regulation will be able to control it.

The dollar is our first line of defense. Unless we have the courage and the self-control to protect its value and its buying power, we shall have lost the very economic system which we are fighting to save. Our power to resist the Communist forces abroad will be fatally undermined, if we fail to preserve a basically sound economy here at home.

To do this will require great sacrifices on the part of each one of us. Unwelcome as new and heavier taxes are, inflation is the worst and most unfair tax of all, since it eats into the spending power of widows and pensioners trying to live on modest, fixed incomes and hits most severely the very people who are least able to afford it.

To give the President another weapon with which to fight inflation by effecting economy in our nondefense spending, I have introduced two bills, H. R. 492 and House Joint Resolution No. 24, which would permit a separate veto of specific items included in an omnibus appropriation bill. H. R. 492 would permit each item in an omnibus funds bill to be treated as a separate measure for the purpose of Presidential consideration. House Joint Resolution No. 24 proposes an amendment to the Constitution to grant specific power to the President to veto a separate item in an omnibus appropriation bill. Whether the necessary approach to this problem is by the constitutional amendment route is a debatable point. There can be little dispute, however, it seems to me, over the proposition that we should set out at once down one or the other of these alternative roads toward fiscal reform.

Although as a general principle, I am opposed to the grant of more power to the executive branch of our Government, I think that a realistic solution, such as an item veto, is perhaps the only practical way of preventing or minimizing logrolling for pet projects.

The amount of stern self-control which the Congress should use this year with respect to such traditionally larded portions of our appropriation bills as the rivers and harbors and flood-control sections may be comprehended if the figures for the lean years of World War II are used as a comparison. In 1944, only $36,800,000 was granted for flood control, and in 1945, only $50,500,000. In the same years $48,000,000 and $54,600,000, respectively, were allowed for rivers and harbors construction and improvement. Compare this with the total of $582,200,000 for these two items in last year's omnibus bill.

To accomplish real economy in Government operation requires the full cooperation of both the executive and the legislative branches of our Government. If the President is sincere in the plea he has voiced for strict economy, certainly Congress should not deny him any weapon he can employ to bring about drastic reductions in nondefense, nonessential spending. Let us open up our anti-inflation arsenal by prompt enactment of legislation to enable the President to disapprove individual expenditures in appropriation bills.

STOP SALE OF INFLUENCE ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, during World War II, the 5-percenters made untold thousands of dollars of the people's money in charging illegal fees.

These fees were mythical considerations and the purchase of influence by naive businessmen who came to Washington cold turkey and had trouble finding their way around.

The 5-percenters were a disgrace to the country and a menace to legitimate business. Yet, it is my understanding that they are returning to the Washington scene even more venomously for they have raised their ante. They are now demanding tribute of 10 percent and higher.

The time has come to stop these highwaymen before they do the damage which they did during the last war. Too much of the taxpayers' money went into their cavernous pockets for imaginary services. The commodity they pretend to sell is influence but only the sucker will fall for them. Nevertheless, they are making hay.

The bill which I am introducing today, if passed by Congress, will take care of these crooks. It is my hope that the House will act soon on this measure for the welfare of the entire country and for the benefit of our home defense program. The bill reads as follows:

A bill to outlaw the sale of influence by false representatives in the matter of defense orders to private business

PREAMBLE

During World War II unscrupulous men accepted 5 percent, 10 percent, and other substantial rewards from business concerns out of total amounts of contracts they were successful in negotiating with certain defense agencies within the Government.

The unscrupulous men accepting percentages of total contract sums are being replaced by even more unscrupulous men who have succeeded in some instances in inducing private business concerns to retain them as their representatives in Washington.

These unscrupulous men claim to have considerable prestige and influence with various Government officials and agree to obtain defense orders for private business concerns in return for generous drawing accounts, sumptuous lodgings and office space in Washington, and countless other endearments. They are often engaged by more than one business firm, whose officers through gullibility are victims of such false representation.

Be it enacted, etc., That—

1. Contracts with the Government for all defense orders shall be negotiated directly between a responsible officer or officers of a corporation on the one hand and a bona fide employee or executive of the United States on the other.

2. It shall be unlawful to retain, hire, or engage the services, either on a percentage basis or drawing account arrangement, of any middleman whose sole function seems to be the employing of special influence which he may profess to have with various governmental agencies or departments or individuals therein.

3. Wherever it can be proved that a middleman received pay or compensation in return for obtaining a defense contract from any agency of the Government through the use of pressure or influence, such contract shall be declared null and void.

4. It shall be unlawful to accept any sum of money as reward for influence rendered in the consummation of a Government contract or defense order.

HAZARD PAY BILL FOR COMBAT GROUND TROOPS

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, in the press of yesterday Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, the Assistant Secretary of Defense, was quoted as saying that the Department of Defense will soon be requesting Congress to act on a hazardous pay bill for combat ground troops. July 19 of last year I introduced a bill for hazard pay for ground troops and reintroduced it again January 3 in the Eighty-second Congress. The bill provides $5 a day for each day a man is in a combat area. This is a bill for which a precedent has already been established. We give hazard pay in the Air Corps and in the Submarine Service.

I understand the plan of the Department of Defense is to give $50 hazard pay to enlisted men and $100 to officers. Let me say that I will oppose any effort to distinguish between officers and enlisted men when it comes to a hazard pay bonus.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. McVEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes on Friday, January 19, following the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes on Tuesday next, following the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

HEROIC TENNESSEE STEWARDESS DIES SAVING LIVES IN BURNING PLANE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include a short article from the Commercial Appeal of Memphis, Tenn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr Speaker, it is not unusual for men to rise on this floor and pay deserving tributes to our brave heroes who are now dying on foreign soil; but it is not often that a Member has the opportunity of paying deserving tribute to such an immortal heroine as Miss Mary Frances Housley, of Fountain City, Tenn., who gave her life in the flaming wreck of an airplane at the International Airport, Philadelphia, Pa., on last Sunday in attempting to save the life of a child whose charred remains were found in the arms of her dead body when the flames were finally subdued.

Someone has said that when it comes to the field of battle—

There is something of pride in the perilous hour,
Whatever be the form which death may lower,
For fame is there to tell who bleeds,
And honor's eye on daring deeds.

The soldier goes to his death trained for the conflict and steeled for the emergency by the presence and bravery of his heroic comrades.

But in this instance, a young girl, only 24 years of age, found herself involved in a horrible disaster, in which a crashed airplane burst into flames, killing 6 of the 25 passengers, and went to her death trying to save them from a horrible death.

She succeeded in leading 10 persons to safety, and then rushed back into the burning plane to try to recover two small children, when she was overcome and perished with one of the little fellows in her arms.

I am sure that every Member of this House, as well as the people of the entire country, will agree with me that a greater act of heroism was never recorded in all the annals of our country.

She deserves the highest praise and the greatest honor our Christian civilization can bestow.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

BUDGET MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has sent to the Congress his budget message calling for a staggering $71,600,000,000 to be spent in the fiscal year 1952. That, according to the President's message, is an increase of 78 percent over expenditures for the year ended June 30.

The President expects the new defense costs to cause a deficit of 16.5 billion dollars in 1952, if no further taxes are added. He proposes to ask new tax legislation to balance this deficit.

We have already been put on notice that this latest extraction of funds from the taxpayer's wallet is going to be a painful one. There is going to be a general "belt-tightening," and we are all going to be "taxed until it hurts."

We expected the financial burden of this defense effort to be terrific. But there will be little or no controversy over any spending that is necessary to safeguard our freedom, or the freedom of peoples, eager like ourselves, to remain free. There can be no quibbling over dollars and cents, if the cost is essential to saving this country from communism.

In view of all this, it seems that the course of wisdom demands that we consider these matters carefully and thoughtfully. The easy way would be for us to approve any appropriations which the administration seeks, and then forget about the whole matter. That would be the easy way, but history might also show it to be the disastrous way.

We have been told, for example, that certain backward areas in the world need help in raising their standards of living in order to save them from communism. To the extent that this is desirable and can be done without lowering the standard of living here, I have very little objection.

But the proposal brings up a question. If raising the standard of living is necessary in these areas to save them from communism, how will lowering the standard of living here affect the United States?

And we certainly do face a lowering of the living standard here. New and painful taxes, coupled with our present inflationary trend, are hitting the American family in the pocketbook. The President says the taxes are necessary, but no one has said or even implied that the inflation is necessary. But it is here, and how great it becomes will depend upon our management of our Government.

Some of the Government's economic master minds have an answer for this inflationary problem.

These people believe the cure-all for inflation is to tax away the money of the men and women who have the ability to earn it. After all, they cannot be trusted with it. So these Government officials would take this money and then give it away. Now is not that simple? And it is just as stupid as it is simple. I, for one, do not subscribe to any such program.

The spot for some real spadework in inflation control is in cutting down on unnecessary Government expenditures. The time has come when the taxpayers' dollar, expended by the Government, must get its full value in purchases.

It is not my desire to cry about water that has already passed over the dam. What is past is past, and there is not anything we can do about it. But we can do better in the future. And I do believe that our responsibility as Members of Congress and as Representatives of the people of the United States should not end merely with the voting of moneys.

I believe that this responsibility extends to a watchdog role on where these funds go and whether or not they are wisely spent. In this connection, it should not be too difficult for the various committees to keep track of these matters.

Here daily we see examples of the biggest business in the world today—the United States Government—engaging in practices that would ruin any private corporation. If a purchasing agent in a private corporation made an error that cost his company several million dollars, he would be fired before the sun went down. But when it happens in Government, the administration simply asks Congress for more taxes.

It is my personal experience and observation that there is too great a gap between the procurement officers of the various agencies and those disposing of so-called surplus property. If a procurement agent is in the market for a certain item, it seems ridiculous that the General Services Administration should be disposing of the same type item at the same time.

I certainly urge that this thing be approached with a sensible and restrained attitude. This is no time for irresponsible shouting and sensationalism. One of the greatest needs is for checking into suspected waste and getting factual information, then using this information constructively.

We should strenuously avoid partisan statements, without foundation, which may cause more disunity within the country, because there is certainly too much disunity existing now. Never in my memory have people been so confused or been so eager for information and facts as they are today.

These are all matters which I believe the Congress should carefully consider, as they may seriously affect the economy of this Nation for years to come. There are so many aspects to be considered that any hasty, ill-advised action might well prove disastrous.

In working out the new tax measures it would be well for the Ways and Means Committee to remember that practically all the States depend upon certain sales taxes to support their schools, their aged, their dependent children, and other such vital services. Any crushing tax program that would seriously cut purchasing power will either curtail these vital agencies or force State legislatures to seek new sources of revenue, thereby increasing the already heavy tax burden.

In this same connection, I might call attention to the civil-defense program. We are appropriating a billion dollars a year for this purpose and we are asking the States to match the Federal help, dollar for dollar. With the people already drained until it hurts, where are the States going to raise this extra revenue?

I hope my remarks in these matters will not be construed as an effort to hamper vital defense spending. I want to put myself on record here and now that I have the utmost faith in the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, Mr. VINSON. I will vote for every dollar that Chairman VINSON and his committee believe is necessary for the defense of this Nation.

But I do not believe our obligation as Members of Congress ends when this money is appropriated. I believe it should go further, and we should know what happens to it after these departments get hold of it.

I believe the committee chairmen should keep us informed of any wastefulness or irregularities of monies appropriated. It behooves us to learn how this money is being spent, and how these supplies are being used. It doesn't seem sensible for Congress to sign a blank check for waste and stupidity.

Nor does it seem sensible that one Government agency should be giving away surplus commodities while another agency is buying those self-same items on the open market at inflated prices. Some of these people should wake up and look around outside of their own little agency's world; they might find a lot of interesting things.

There should be a closer integration between agencies. They should begin to realize that they are not separate entities. They are all a part of the Government of the United States. And if they don't realize this and start pulling together, there may be no jobs, no Government, and no United States.

This country can be ruined more surely by waste, extravagance, resultant inflation, and financial bankruptcy than by any armed assault of Soviet Russia. It is our obligation, as Representatives of the people of these United States, to see that this does not occur.

The American people realize the danger to this country. They realize that defense will cost money and blood, and they are ready to pay that price. But, if my mail is an indication, they are getting sick and tired of seeing millions and billions tossed around by irresponsible people here in Washington as though it is small change.

Our President has told us that the cost of rearmament will be high, and that the people must be "taxed until it hurts." If the people know that this money, due to be so painfully extracted, is being well and wisely spent, it might serve to alleviate some of the pain.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. My distinguished colleague has made a very forceful statement motivated by a genuine concern on his part, a concern which I am sure stems from his long experience as wartime Governor of our fair State during the last war. May I say to the gentleman that I think his statement is very appropriate at this time and it is worthy of our most careful consideration. It reflects quite accurately what the people are thinking about and what they are talking about.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I thank the gentleman.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, during roll call No. 5 I was unavoidably detained.

Had I been present I would have voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 1 hour.

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, at this hour when fate interposes a serious challenge to America's destiny we have the obligation, each in his own way, of proving up the democratic processes and validating our democratic values.

For upon what we do and say here, upon how America acts in this era of crisis, largely depends the survival of that which history records as Western Civilization, a span of centuries in the annals of humankind that has brought the world its greatest progress, enlightenment and spiritual enrichment.

In our approach to a discussion of the international situation, which has brought America and the Free World sharply up with the realization that its very existence as such is jeopardized, we would do well not to lose sight of several vital and simple fundamentals, and to dwell upon them despite all the complexities which surround them. We must not be lured by the temptations of obstructionism, no matter how beguiling, away from the central issues at stake.

Perhaps it will assist us in our discussion if we attempt to set forth, at the beginning, the more imperative of the questions requiring debate and solution. And quickly before I undertake this task of orientation, I wish to avail myself of the privilege of paying tribute to the members of this House and the other body for the profound and serious and sincere way in which they have embraced the subject of debate on our foreign policy. All of us as servants and as citizens can well be proud, I feel, of the honesty of purpose, the patriotic motivation and intellectual honesty which have characterized the continuing discussion of the great issues which demand our attention, and are equally insistent of constructive solution.

Those who do not understand America—and what dictator ever did?—will be quick to sense in these discussions an imagined gain through what they erroneously believe to be a tragic disunity in the American front, all the time never realizing that what really is at work is the alchemy of democratic action: clarifying, solidifying, catelyzing until the articulated American conscience makes itself felt in action—devastating to tyrants.

The whole tone and temper of this debate has been admirably established on a high plane by the President, who in his state of the Union message eloquently reaffirmed for all the world to read—even those who run on the road that leads to disaster—America's total dedication to freedom and to peace—and of this Nation's firm intent never to abandon those goals even should their pursuit carry us through the carnage and ruin and agonies of war. Similarly, as I have said before, all the discussants have spoken in the same vein and by their conduct and contributions have strengthened the resolve of America to fulfill the role which destiny has alloted to her.

There is no disagreement as to purpose—the pursuit of peace in a free world—there is no disunity on the need of stern and decisive action to achieve our ends. There exists only differences on the methods to be adopted and steps to be taken best calculated to meet the situation. And therein, I submit, is a considerable area for wide and honest differences of opinion. It remains our task to resolve the differences in ways that will not vitiate our purpose, weaken our resolve, dissipate our strength, or invite failure.

Accordingly, I proceed to the heart of the matter.

This is not the first time in history that a nation, an alliance, a civilization, has been challenged by threatening forces.

Of those challenged, some nations and civilizations survived, others fell as wheat before the sickle.

The test stone in all cases was the response the nation or civilization made to the challenge.

In all too many instances decay had set in and ruin was a guest in the house long before the threat knocked at the door.

I know it is not necessary to illustrate this with a long list of examples. Grade-school histories are replete with one example after another.

So we would do well, in the present situation, to consult the historic parallels. I will return to this later on, but now I would like to press on to the immediate problem at hand.

Much of our difficulty and that of the democratic world derives from the fact that we have not truly understood the nature of the enemy. We have not comprehended that Soviet Russia is not just another state, a foreign power, rather it is the seat of a revolution of nihilism, a godless state, conceived in atheistic revolt against the democratic world, and dedicated to the enslavement of the peoples of the world on the one hand and the utter destruction of everything of Judeo-Christian civilization extant.

Now these are not idle phrases spoken for rhetorical effect. These are not something conjured up to make an impressive looking indictment. These are not words to be utilized upon a privileged forum. No, they are a factual representation of the spirit, arms, and avowed objectives of Soviet imperialism, and in a hundred different ways and words—the Soviets' own words—we have proof. We will never be wholly prepared to deal with the threat posed to our survival as a free and independent people until we truly understand the menace of the communistic revolution in all its diabolical assault on western civilization. When we know it for what it is we can meet it and counter it in its every phase, in its manifold and insidious war against the democratic world.

One of our first and most costly mistakes was the belief that in the war against Hitler the Soviets were our allies. That brief partnership in arms, a partnership, incidentally, in which American aid accounted for approximately 70 percent of Russian war matériel, was instead only an arrangement in which America and her allies and Russia had a common enemy. We thought we had an ally in Russia, but she never validated that contract because all the time she had a mental reservation and there was no marriage. This became all too apparent even before the fighting was over. Stalin went into one of his famous about-faces when it became apparent the fury of the Nazi war machine was broken and spent. Do not take my estimate of this. Instead I give you the official Soviet documentation on this development in the Soviet revolution against western civilization:

> The fact that the Soviet Union and the greatly shaken capitalist countries showed themselves to be in one powerful camp, ranged against the Fascist aggressors, showed that the struggle of two systems within democratic camp was temporarily alleviated, suspended, but this of course does not mean the end of this struggle.

These are Varga's words found in Features of Internal and Foreign Policies of Capitalists Countries in Epoch of General Crisis of Capitalism, World Economy and Politics, No. 6, June 1946, page 11. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, it is one of the early postwar manifestations of a revival of the doctrine of impossibility of peaceful coexistence of the USSR with capitalism.

The writings and official documents of communism are replete with declarations of war against the capitalist world. Take the words of Lenin in his paper entitled "Tactics of the Russian Communist Party," report to the Third Congress of Communist Internaticnal, July 5, 1921. Lenin at that time said:

> Dictatorship is a state of war. We are precisely in such a state. There is no military invasion at present; but we are isolated. * * * Until the final issue is decided, the state of awful war will continue.

Now to those who may say that all of this was uttered some 30 years ago, I hasten to reply that such source material is constantly being issued and reissued down to the present day as advice and guidance for Communists everywhere. This particular gem was published in Selected Works, International Publishers, New York, 1943, volume IX, page 242. As you can readily see it advises party workers that the struggle against the opposition would continue with violence until the latter was destroyed. No relaxation of the dictatorship could be expected until security was attained.

So that we may be on guard and alert in any dealings with the Soviets it is well to have this slant, which again, is from their own official writings: "The time has fully matured when it is absolutely necessary for every Communist Party systematically to combine legal with illegal work." Here is the policy of planned deceit, the official sanctioning of illegality as an instrument of Soviet aggrandizement. Again, let us take the subject of truth. Here I quote:

> The idea that the truth remains the truth is admissible in a philosophical club, but in the party, the decisions of the Congress are obligatory also upon those who doubt the correctness of a decision. Our party is strong through the fact that the decisions of the majority are obligatory upon all not only in form, but in substance.

Here we have the key of the performances of Communist spokesmen throughout the world who speak the pieces dictated by Moscow no matter what the object situation. It is the source and origin of the big lie technique. Through its adoption, the Soviets have been able to bring about, for many practical purposes, a debasement of language, a convenient dodge which enables them to create and spread confusion, arm their propaganda guns to the full and carry on the great sham at the United Nations.

All of this is very important, for Red propagandists understand that once an impression is established it remains in the mind long after the reason for its formation has been forgotten. The Soviet propagandists know that most people seldom revise attitudes once accepted on the basis of apparent evidence even when they later learn that the evidence was false. The victim has been attitudinalized.

In this respect much harm has been done in America by Communist sympathizers who used places of influence and strategic placement to poison the fountain-springs of our intellectual and cultural life, to shape and mould public opinion in ways that have proved detrimental to our own best interests.

It is worthy of note in this connection that although a considerable section of American public opinion was encouraged to the belief that the Communist movement in China was purely of national origin and represented not a Moscow-inspired revolt, but rather the instinctive groupings of Chinese "agrarians," the Soviets as far back as 1928 had outlined a nine-point program to win over the Chinese. The nine points, as published in Theses on the Revolutionary Movement in the Colonies in 1928 and representing the Theses and Resolutions of VI Congress of Communist International, 1928, were as follows:

First. Overthrow of imperialist domination.

Second. Confiscation of foreign enterprises and banks.

Third. Unity of the country, with recognition of the right of each nationality to self-determination.

Fourth. Overthrow of the power of the militarists and the Kuomintang.

Fifth. Establishment of the power of Soviets', of workers', peasants', and soldiers' representatives.

Sixth. The 8-hour working day, increase of wages, assistance to the unemployed, and social insurance.

Seventh. Confiscation of all lands of big landlords, land for peasants and soldiers.

Eighth. The abolition of all governmental, militarist, and local taxes; a single progressively graduated income tax.

Ninth. Alliance with the USSR and the world proletarian movement.

Yes, these are the means through which Moscow sought for years to gain control of China. It is not too far a step from that crafty beginning to the shooting in Korea where American boys are dying from Chinese Communist arms, while Chiang remains a virtual prisoner in Formosa.

I would ask that you consider carefully for a moment that nine-point program which Moscow used as the catch-all for suckers in the Soviet's planned program to gain control of China. Sprinkled in with the outright Soviet pitches are some attractive social-economic devices which were calculated to attract the confused and frustrated youth of China. In the manipulation of such a situation, the Soviets have shown themselves able practitioners. The sad and sorry part of the whole business, however, is that such promises are only a snare and delusion, for once the tenacles of Soviet imperialism get into a nation's economy and the agents of Moscow come into political control of a state, the pledges for peace, democracy, and equity become a cruel hoax and all the horror apparatus of the police state goes into operation.

As a matter of fact, one of the most grievous crimes of Soviet imperialism is what the Soviet aristocracy has done and is doing to the Russian people and the various nationals of the captive states. The record of inhumanities, deprivations, torture, mental cruelties, and vicious exploitation of the little people of Russia and the satellites under Stalin's regime is something which virtually defies comprehension. Think for a moment of the famines in the liquidation of the Kulaks, the ever-recurring purges which wipe out whole rows in the Soviet hierarchy, the pilloring and persecution of intellectuals and scientists, the lamentable fate of deviationists. In all the history of mankind, there is nothing to equal this record of brutality and mass murder. I would urge each and everyone of you to read Suzanne Labin's Stalin's Russia, wherein this gifted French writer gives you an appraisal of Russia by taking the Soviets at their own words, using official documents, publications, and utterances to put together the dark picture.

Never let us be deceived by the false-faces and the fronts the Soviets may put on. We would do well to hearken well to the words of Benjamin Gitlow, one time highly placed American Communist, who later "did time," when he warns in his book, The Whole of Their Lives:

> The Communists took Marxism out of the realm of utopian idealism and political abstraction to build a powerful world revolution movement so fluid and flexible, so devoid of illusions, moral scruples and ideals, that often the erroneous conclusion was reached that the Communist movement had departed from its basic principles and abandoned communism altogether.

No, we must never forget that the men in charge of Soviet imperialism, the masters of the Kremlin are true sons of revolution who arrived at their present position of Soviet eminence through intrigue, treachery, and violence.

Bear in mind constantly that the members of the Politburo obviously possess in high degree four fateful traits of character:

In the first place they are able and vigorous.

In the second place they are devoted singlemindedly to the cause of communism. They are fanatics.

In the third place, they are ruthless. Their fanaticism is matched only by their ruthlessness.

In the fourth place, they are realistic. Being what they are explains what they have done.

They have tightened their control on the so-called heartland of Eurasia. They have stimulated and encouraged and directed their counterparts in Korea and China. They have carefully timed an offensive against Indochina and all of this fits into a pattern just as does their move against Tibet. On the one hand, America is committed heavily of her total military strength in Korea, leaving Japan for the moment without any substantial strength military-wise. In such vacuums, Communist propagandists have an ideal field for operations. The aggressions in Korea and against Tibet have not been lost upon India, while the action in Indochina has kept the French well occupied, placing a strain upon France's military manpower and treasury. England of course has been kept apprehensive by the exposed condition of Hong Kong, and the peoples of the Philippines and the nations of southeast Asia, in the throes of movements sparked by nationalistic stirrings, are being subjected to the raw fundamentals of grim power politics.

Before getting down to a consideration of specifics to meet this growing threat and expanding menace, I would like to stress that it is the worst kind of superficial thinking for any of us or any nation to proceed on the assumption and base policy on the belief that Asia is divisible from Europe or that the enveloping global struggle can be segmented, cut in parts and pieces, and one continent closed off in our thinking or in the life processes while we devote ourselves to what we may consider a more urgent section of the globe. No it is all one big struggle, there are many theaters but they are all part of the one contest. What happens here in Washington today has its effect in Formosa as it does in London. Science has made a neighborhood of the world. Time and space are being destroyed in many aspects by the onward rush of scientific achievement. The sensitive fabric of the modern world is such that a development in one place may have profound reaction somewhere thousands of miles away. Just remember the slogan of the aviation industry: "No spot on earth is more han 48 hours away from your local airport." Radio, television, wireless, all the marvels of modern communication, have helped knit up the world into a community of interest.

So in the development of a foreign policy and in shaping up of military forces for its implementaion we must not make the serious mistake of separationist thinking. When we have thought this out thoroughly and completely and traced out all its ramifications then we will be self-convinced of the utter futility and mistakenness of anything that savors of isolationism.

It would help us in this debate if we forthrightly admit that ours is to be a policy of enlightened self interest. Certainly it is to our self interest to fight to defend Europe just as it is to our interest to attempt to stem the tide of Red aggression in Asia, or wherever it breaks out violently.

Now the cry will come back that we cannot be everywhere at all times in strength and rather than dissipate our substance in ill-considered military actions we should husband our resources and wait until the day when we are better fortified. We or our allies are not ready, we are told, and therefore we should do nothing whatsoever that might get the Kremlin mad at us.

This is merely a modified form of appeasement. What are we and the free world to do—crawl on our bellies like reptiles because the Kremlin commands more divisions and has more tanks ready to commit to action? The one thing that Soviet imperialism despises above everything else is weakness and a cringing spirit. Man has come to a sad estate, indeed, if at the price of saving his carcass he is ready to sacrifice his honor, his dignity and his freedom. Now the fact of the matter is that his love of liberty and devotion to freedom are truly his greatest weapons and in the long run, no matter what the odds, the human spirit will win out over tyranny.

We have had and are having our reverses in Korea and we daily hear the question asked: Why are we fighting there? We had no business there. Well I for one, and in saying this I am mindful of the great sacrifices that America has put into that military campaign, I for one say, though the way may be bloody and heartbreaking, time will bear out the wisdom and efficacy of the decision to have endeavored to call a halt to communism expansion then and there. The free world must have the will to survive or it will perish.

Before we become overwhelmed with contemplations of reverses, we would do well to go back a few pages in history and remember the days when Hitler was taking countries without firing a shot, and later how his mechanized hordes swept to the channel and the odds on him were long, indeed—but there he met an opponent who never entertained even a notion of defeat, who forged armament from his very spirit, who was prepared to fight to the death but never surrender—and then you know how the fight to hold on developed until the democratic world rose in its might as the moral opinion of liberty-loving people everywhere swelled the forces of righteousness and Hitler's chance had passed.

How well I recall the dismal prophets of the pre-Munich days who warned against taking on the arms of the Reich, for the Luftwaffe, we were told, constituted an armada that would wipe its opponents off the face of the earth. These are things to remember at this hour whenever so many are prone to summon the counsels of despair.

There is a tendency, and it is a serious error, I feel, in casting up an appraisal of the global situation, to place too much stress upon the strength and resources of the enemy while at the same time marking down our own assets and those of our allies. I say this in face of the evidence that I have recounted at length as to the nature of the enemy, but I am convinced that we are doing our cause a gross disservice when we develop and foster the myth of invincibility of the enemy, when we fail to point up positively our own strengths.

In the first place we and our allies have great superiority in those technological facilities and skills which go into the massing of economic power for armament to conduct a war successfully. We are better fortified in materials and resources. We have greater productivity per capita, considerably higher standards of living, stronger incentives, and a long, magnificent tradition of freedom.

Of course, I am well aware that this kind of emphasis without critical study of the situation can easily lead us into error, for while we and our allies greatly outstrip the Soviets in the matter, say, of steel production, the fact remains that Russia is putting much more of its lesser steel output into armament than are we. So we have the task of quickly and efficiently making the most of what we have both as to manpower and material goods so that the potentials of the free world will be realized speedily and the threat confronting it diminished.

There is another consideration, however, that is the nub of the matter: If the Soviets move against Western Europe and overpower it, then the factors which made for the advantages of the Atlantic Pact nations will be decisively and dangerously reversed, and the edge will be Russia's by an impressive margin. This is what we must not lose sight of for an instant as we proceed through the days in a discussion of the situation.

The prize in Western Europe:

Population:
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	216,000,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	285,000,000
United States and Canada	164,000,000
Armies (manpower):
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	900,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	3,700,000
United States and Canada	1,132,000
Navies (tonnage):
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	1,500,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	450,000
United States and Canada	1,800,000
Air Forces (aircraft):
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	8,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	28,000
United States and Canada	28,500
Steel (tons per year):
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	46,000,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	28,000,000
United States and Canada	93,000,000
Coal (tons per year):
Atlantic Pact nations plus West Germany	420,000,000
Soviet Union and European satellites	400,000,000
United States and Canada	500,000,000

Properly considered the debate on foreign policy should not be primarily concerned with military strategy or tactics but others have seen fit to introduce this aspect as a prime subject so we must of necessity meet their arguments head-on.

Considering the military policy suggestions of the retreatists, we might well invoke Pareto's dictum:

> Let us have theoretical theories and practical practices for practical theories and theoretical practices are an abomination.

It is generally taken for granted by the people of the United States and the world that America's superiority in A-bombs is the element in the international situation which may be best calculated to serve as a deterrent to Russia launching an all-out war. Winston Churchill has given this as his strong belief. It is a logical assumption. There are other handles to the question, however: One is that the Russians are generally supposed to be making rapid strides in the manufacture of A-bombs. Another is that whereas the United States would never use the bomb first, there is no such moral deterrent in the Soviet ethic, so that brings us to the point that with a disproportionately smaller number of A-bombs, Russia, striking first, could do much to nullify our advantage of a larger A-bomb stock. Our military people generally impute to the Russians the military capability of delivering the bomb against prime targets in the United States.

Our answer to this threat is the Strategic Air Command. We have built this service well. We will build it bigger and better. We have the means and the capacity to strike devastating blows against an enemy that hits America's homeland.

Students of military science should ponder well before taking any action which will compel the United States to use this retaliatory force. Fortunately we have the strongest Navy afloat. And we do not propose to leave it in a static state; it is being added to; there is room for improvement in the submarine field, and this matter is not being neglected. Together with our allies, and even allowing for the supposedly vast extension of Russia's undersea components, we have and should be able to maintain control of the seas. In a war of continents this would be a marked advantage, although we are not going to forget that the enemy would be working along interior lines.

In our projections, giving ourselves the best of it in the air and on the seas, I do not for the life of me understand how men versed in statecraft, history, and even possessing a smattering of military knowledge would propound the proposition that we can seek refuge in those elements and practically dissolve ground forces. As a matter of fact, military history points up one moral, and that is that all arms are essentially accessories to the main element of decisiveness: the battlefield. Wars only progress and are won as men on the battlefield move forward, take enemy territory, destroy enemy forces, ultimately break the will of civil populations to persist in fruitless conflict, until eventually the victor's ground forces occupy and control the enemy's homeland. This is a classic and fundamental military concept.

Because I regard this aspect of the debate of such over-riding importance, I am going to impose upon your indulgence and quote at some length on this point in the hope that there may be punctured finally and completely the fallacious notion that because a power is strong in the air and the seas ground forces are dispensable.

A recognized military historian, Col. S. L. A. Marshall, now editor of the Detroit News, writing on the subject, Battle Command in Future War, had this to say:

The battlefield is the epitome of war. All else in war, when war is perfectly conducted, exists but to serve the forces of the battlefield and to assure final success on the field.

It is on the battlefield that the issues of war are decided. Yet it may well occur in the struggle between nations that such a preponderance of power will be achieved by one side or the other, or such destruction will be worked on one body or the other either by weapons of the air or by a naval blockade, as to virtually predetermine the results of the battlefield.

Even so, the contests between land armies will continue to be the concluding act in war. Without this conclusion military victory will not be achieved.

The greater becomes the emphasis on weapons whose destructive power is aimed at the civil society, the more certain it is that the battlefield will continue as the area of final decision in war. This trend cannot be reversed. It can be ended only when the mortal dangers to all civil populations are so universally recognized, and that recognition is so directly reflected in the policies of the various states and the attitudes of their peoples, as to end war itself.

The mobilizing of all national forces and resources in war does not lessen the decisive importance of all that occurs on the battlefield. Nor can the evolution of new weapons establish a form of war in which military decision is foreseeable and the danger of stalemate can be reckoned avertable, without full preparation to engage the land forces of the enemy with forces of the same sort.

The over-all effect of the changing pattern of war, as it is superinduced by the character of the new weapons, is to promote an ever increasing involvement of national forces and national prestige. This in turn makes more critical the events of the battlefield. For it should be noted that all military power is dependent of the civil will. It is the nation, and not its army, that makes war. But when all the forces of a society are directed toward the shaping of a decisive instrument in war and the cutting edge of the instrument falls on the field of battle, the result is not alone the defeat of an army, but the envelopment or dissolution of a society.

And then this pertinent discourse on the subject of decision:

What is decision? It cannot be a matter of counting the totals of dead on the contending sides, nor yet of measuring how the preponderance of force is weighted within the victorious side. It implies a final determination of the issue. Decision is obtained by those who survive and not by those who die in striving for it. It is an act which enables the establishment of tranquility and the restoration of political action. It is an advance on Richmond, not a Gettysburg, a bold stroke across a bridge at Remagen, not a landing on the coast of Normandy.

In total war, decision recedes farther and farther into distance until one final act brings about quick collapse and submission of the force protecting the enemy interior. Be the chaos of the defending civilization ever so great, as long as there remains an organized will to resist, defeat is not insured. The final act will always be an act of the battlefield, whether the ground forces which achieve it move by overland transport, or by sea or by air.

Air power is essential to national survival. But air power, unsupported by the forces of the battlefield, is a military means without an end.

And so, in my humble judgment, it would be tragic short-sightedness for us to short-change the very decisive element of ground forces just because we were strong in other branches of the military. And by the same token it would be monumental folly and akin to courting disaster to endeavor by legislative fiat to tie the hands of the Commander in Chief and our military leaders from placing those ground forces in those parts of the world where they are best calculated to meet the threat of Soviet expansionism.

Inasmuch as this subject was the spark which set off this debate in the first place, I am sure you will abide with me until I have thoroughly and I hope, effectively, dealt with this phase of the question.

There can be no fundamental objection to the approval of a resolution having to do with the use of troops overseas if this resolution would not seek to order or direct the President in any particular way, but would express the belief of the Congress that the dispatch of troops to foreign soil would be desirable. Such an action would give congressional participation in the decision, but would not give the Congress any veto power, either assumed or actual. The President clearly has a constitutional right to send troops for these purposes without consultation. I cannot agree with the argument that the Congress has the right to flatly direct the President to make no troop commitments until and unless Congress has given its explicit consent. The United Nations Charter and the North Atlantic Treaty, by due constitutional process, are now the law of the land. There is merit to the position that in view of the fact that the other body was assured that the United States would not be called upon to provide soldiers in advance of an actual attack that the Executive should consult with the Congress before sending troops overseas whether or not he had a legal right to act alone, at least as such action implements these treaties.

The House has time and again stated its willingness to listen to the advice of the chiefs of the Armed Forces on all matters of troop disposition for the national defense. I believe the Executive has done and will do so. That being the case, the Executive would hardly act under implied power unless after the advice of the defense chiefs in the interest of the national security; and, if that is so, very few Members of Congress would care to superimpose their contrary opinion. Why then, other than for academic reasons, select this hour for a vitriolic and tumultous debate as to which comes first, the chicken or the egg?

In view of the long series of precedents of the implied power of the President with reference to the dispatch of troops to foreign soil, the Coudert resolution amounts to a request for a vote of lack of confidence in the Executive during a period of grave national emergency—and if that is the purpose—I challenge the gentleman to unmask his attack and introduce a resolution which asks such a vote and let that issue be met head-on.

There is no basis for the assumption that in advance of aggression the President would not ask the approval of Congress to send additional troops to Europe.

In the face of world events there is no margin for error. All doubts must be resolved against the creation of a constitutional crisis at this time.

Down through our history there is precedent after precedent for the Chief Executive acting quickly and directly in committing our Armed Forces to action in the national interest. In this connection, Edward S. Corwin, the recognized expert in this field, in his volume The President: Office and Powers, dealing with the Presidency from 1787 to 1948 has this to say on this subject:

But the President may also make himself the direct administrator of the international rights and duties of the United States, or of what are adjudged by him to be such, without awaiting action either by the treaty-making power or by Congress, or by the courts.

One President after another has availed himself of this prerogative.

Upwards of 140 separate instances of such direct Presidential action are cited in James Grafton Rogers' volume entitled "World Politics and the Constitution." They start with the undeclared naval war with France from 1798 to 1800, down through Caribbean engagements from 1814 to 1825, including the Barbary wars, various landing of marines in numbers in many countries, military encounters with Mexico, naval demonstrations of Commodore Perry against Japan, military action against China in 1854, again in 1855 and 1856, numerous actions against South American countries, incidents in Korea in 1871, and again in 1888, and so on down to the action taken in connection with the Philippine Insurrection in 1899–1901.

During the first three decades of the twentieth century at least a score of such direct military engagements were taken in the protection of American interests in the international field by direct authority vested in the Presidential office. Similarly in the years from 1940 through 1941 this country undertook a series of vital steps, geared to foreign policy and in the national interest, upon Presidential initiative, including the exchange of destroyers for British bases, the United States occupation of Greenland, the occupation of Iceland. Not the least of such steps was the Presidential order to the Navy to patrol ship lanes to Europe in an effort to check the Nazi submarine menace.

Let it be noted that all actions taken in regard to commitment of our Armed Forces abroad are not done arbitrarily or capriciously but only after the most serious and profound consideration and upon the advice of our military and congressional leaders and in consultation with the State Department.

I see nothing reflecting upon the proper exercise of proper Executive power, by having the President go before a joint session of the Congress and tell them that a certain set of circumstances demands a troop movement. It is interesting to observe that down through the pages of American history the action of the Congress with reference to war has always been to declare that a state of war exists and never to actually declare war. This undoubtedly has resulted in the fact that the Congress was presented with a fait accompli at the moment of its action, but, nevertheless, this legal fact does exist. In this debate I am concerned deeply with avoiding acrimonious debate which will show the world that the forces of democracy are divided and permit the world to conclude that the forces of communism are united.

It must not be forgotten that the President has certain constitutional duties and prerogatives which he has sworn to uphold to meet such a crisis that exists.

I do not argue against debate. The debate in itself may be desirable, but all of the facts pertinent to the issue should be made known and available to all factions and all views on all sides of the debate by the President, and with particular reference to the European situation, by General Eisenhower when he returns from Europe. I think this vital to the course of the debate and to the tone of the debate in order to prevent any participant from alarming the country by saying that facts have been concealed and that information has been withheld. I believe that at this point everything is being done to advise all concerned.

To underestimate the danger existing at this time to our way of life would be tragic, but I repeat, for the purpose of emphasis, in this debate we must show the world that we will not have a violent, bitter division. That we are not engaged in personalities and that this great debate will be held, by the debaters, at the level of the great decision that must be made.

Pertinent to this discussion, especially in the matter of committing American military strength to the defense of Europe, are the following remarks by the distinguished French journalist, Bertrand De Jouvenel, now visiting in the United States—what I quote is part of a letter he recently wrote to the editor of the Wall Street Journal:

As of today, the potential force of the non-Soviet world is very superior to that of the Soviet world, while the actualized force of the Soviets is the greater. Now the main interest of the Soviets is to get into a position where the potential force of the non-Soviet world shall have so dwindled and that of the Soviet world so waxed that it shall have become impossible to challenge them. And the value of the Soviets' actual ready-to-march forces lies precisely in their ability to discourage resistance on the several points which are the objectives of their political offensive.

May I say, with all respect to the personalities of ex-President Hoover and Senator TAFT, that the policy they advocate is precisely that which serves the purpose of Soviet expansion, since it would clear the way for the Russian advance, estopped only by the risk of war with the United States.

If I understand the Senator's statement aright, he would not put troops into Europe but he would go to war in the case of invasion by Russia. This position was at one time that of the American Government. It had to be abandoned because the Europeans said they were unwilling that American support should manifest itself in the shape of bombing as soon as the Russians were in. Indeed this form of protection is apt to throw the Europeans into the arms of Russia. The policy advocated tends to dishearten the Europeans—"The United States is not going to defend us, therefore all that if left is to make a deal with Stalin"—and to pave the way for the political conquest of Western Europe. And a political conquest of Western Europe, that is with the consent of governments, also delivers to the enemy the vast resources of the African colonies and dependencies.

And on my own, may I add that the greatest deposits of uranium and cobalt are said to be in Africa.

Well, the logical question is, Where do we go from here?

First and foremost we should at every turn and in every way possible make known to the Soviet imperialists and to our friends in the world that we will have no part of appeasement in any shape, way, or form. The President has bravely and wisely and in a statesmanlike way taken the lead in this respect, and all Members of Congress should sustain him in this regard no matter in what other political areas they may have differences with him.

Secondly, we know we are confronted with a dangerous menace in the form of Soviet imperialism, which is committed to the enslavement of the free world and the destruction of the very foundations of western civilization.

Knowing this, we must say without any reservations that we will take any and all such steps necessary to thwart this conspiracy against humanity no matter what the costs, and furthermore, once we have marshaled our strengths, we will move out in ways to make our program one of positiveness, so that all peoples no matter how small in the global scheme may have a chance to pursue their destinies in peace.

Naturally in this grand offensive we want the moral support and such aid as they can give of our democratic friends in the world, and they can be assured that on our part there will be no turning back, no hedging, and no mean bookkeeping. We will do our part; they in turn must do theirs. And no amount of sophistical equivocation is going to substitute for earnest, all-out compliance with the grand strategy of the free world.

So we should, as I see it, take adequate measures to fortify Western Europe, including the rearming of Germany as an independent state—all or any part of her that will agree, so as to prevent the prize of the industrial Ruhr falling into Soviet hands. Yugoslavia, Turkey, and Greece shall be invited to join. We should, without any further delay, take steps looking to putting arms into the hands of Spain so that the west may have the comfort and practical advantage of a bastion behind the Pyrenees in the event the Russians move out upon Western Europe. At the same time every step should be taken to insure the solidity and democratic strength of Central and South America. Our outposts in Alaska must be readied without delay and not a single moment lost in rushing to completion the vital radar screen. At home, civil defense should have a high priority. We face a generation of partial national mobilization.

Getting around to the Pacific, we must proceed with a program for Japan that will bring that country back into the family of nations as an independent power, and thus have a people able to protect their homeland in this day of brutal aggression. We should make it possible for the Japanese leaders to facilitate rearmament.

Not the very least of the things which need to be done in this enveloping global conflict is the further strengthening and expanding of our propaganda arm. Already we have been treated to notable improvement in this vital campaign. Nothing should be left undone that will enable us to bring America's story to the world, especially to those captive people who are behind the iron curtain.

Never let us forget that the American record in the attempted conquest of peace is a proud and a luminous one. We have crusaded for the objective of a just and equitable peace. We should not forget and we should not let the world forget that when we offered the Marshal plan for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Europe we barred no nation—Russia itself was offered the chance to participate in its benefits. Neither should we forget or allow the world to forget that Molotov marched out of the meeting taking the representatives of Poland and Czechoslovakia with him.

And in the reckoning on the assets and liabilities of the European scene we would do well to remember that in many captive countries there are strong underground movements, the members of which have never accepted the yoke of the foreign dictator, and in the event of a general war the Soviets would have to deal with this inspired army. Poland does not forget the slaughter of Warsaw, made possible by Soviet trickery. In one country after another in Central and Eastern Europe the fires of freedom may be banked but they have not expired. It is to this audience that we must continue to get our message across. So propaganda becomes a major instrument for us, just as the Russians have long employed it. Walter Winchell was right when in his broadcast of Sunday, January 12, 1950, he said:

Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia will join any invasion army against Russia.

The advancement of such a program on the international front naturally imposes certain heavy strains upon the home front, and I am well aware that our military effort can only be as effective as our national economy is sound. I, for one, do not subscribe to the proposition that what is here proposed is going to bankrupt the Nation. I am convinced that we can meet this threat and rise to this occasion—no, I say that the American economy has in it such dynamic potentials that, if we set our sights high enough and our efforts are sparked by genuine patriotism, we cannot only astonish the world once again but we can equally surprise ourselves. And by so doing, by applying ourselves diligently, unselfishly, and earnestly to the task at hand we will be spiking the Communists' guns by demonstrating to the world that not only is capitalistic democracy not decadent but on the contrary is virile, competent, productive, and offers man the best chance of happiness and security here on earth.

Now I have spoken at considerable length here today and I am deeply in your debt for the favor of the time allotted me and for your generous attention. I know the world is weary of dialectics—it hungers for simple truths and a chance for life in surroundings of true peace.

I want to say that the thing we must avoid above everything else is a mean retreat into negative escapism. That way lies disaster. The United States has never flinched in the face of threats. And America is not now going to sell its soul to the devil.

If I do nothing else here today, I hope I can impart to you the conviction that despite our shortcomings and in the face of human mistakes, and no matter how deadly the crisis, the American Republic and its democratic colleagues throughout the world were never better fortified to carry their principles forward into genuine achievement, no matter what the threat, what the obstacles, or what the opposition.

And finally, I will raise this point before others among you do: in all that I have said I have spoken in a way and tone that would seem to imply the inevitability of war—and to this and to you I make answer.

That it is only by a true understanding of the enemy and a knowledge of what he is up to and a quick moving on our part and by our friends to fill the vacuums in the international field that we stand any chance of achieving a condition worthy of the name of peace, and of winning the war if all decent efforts fail.

So I end with the note that we are engaged in a fight for all that is good and we will succeed in that great endeavor with God's help.

PERSONAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. REAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to explain my absence from the Chamber during the roll call on the bill, H. R. 1001. I was present during the debate and was called from the Chamber. I was in the Capitol, but did not hear the bells ring for the roll call.

I wish to state, had I been present I would have voted "aye" on the roll call.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BUTLER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

DEFEAT IN DETAIL

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert on military affairs but have common sense and try to use it to the best of my ability for the good of our country and the American way of life. So this is my analysis of the present situation we find ourselves in.

The phrase "defeat in detail" is very well known to every student of military science. Before I go further into the text of this speech, I should like to place myself clearly and unequivocally on record as being in favor of appropriating and expending every dollar needed to properly prepare this country and its people for any eventuality. By this I mean not only our military expenditures for the Army, Navy, and Air Corps but also for civil defense.

If one studies the campaigns that were carried out by the Maccabeeans, Alexander the Great, Hannibal, Caesar, or in more modern times, Napoleon, in each instance, when faced by a coalition of his enemies, each one of these leaders, by properly maneuvering his forces, before his enemies joined forces, was able to decisively defeat his opponent, "in detail."

It is time for us to face the facts and to realize that Russia and our enemy, world communism, intends to defeat us in the same pattern, and up to this point they have succeeded. We have committed ourselves in Korea with "too little," and now the administration is again asking us to commit ourselves in Europe with "too little."

I want to contain and fight communism wherever it may rear its ugly head, but I am opposed to the dissipation of our strength in a series of actions which can lead to only disastrous results.

Before committing a single additional American boy to the European area I wish to ask our Secretary of Defense the question: "How many divisions must we have in Europe in order to contain the Russians?" And when the answer is given to us, I state here and now, that I am opposed to committing one single soldier of our country until such a time that we know that, if necessary, we can commit the power needed to bring us a decisive victory. If we cannot place such forces and resources in the field, then all the fighting and dying by our heroic forces will surely have been in vain, as it has been in Korea.

I feel that we are entitled to know how many troops our allies will put in the field, and I also want to know that they will put them in the field NOW. It would be very unfortunate for our commanders to depend upon the help of 40, 50, or 100 divisions of our allies in Europe and find that when they are needed they exist only as "paper divisions." Until such a time that this situation is clarified I believe it is improper on the part of anyone to send any further troops abroad.

Since the close of hostilities, we have expended billions upon billions to aid the nations of Europe, and what have we in return? Government after government which have failed or refused to bring their people face to face with reality. Many of these governments seem to feel that our purse is bottomless. As practical men we know that is not so.

If we are to continue spending these fabulous amounts of money let us get back something—some value received.

I have great confidence in General Eisenhower. But I also believe our staff should have something to say about the method of training the forces of our allies—I know our staff officers can greatly help in the proper organization of these forces.

Gentlemen, we know our enemy is morally bankrupt. All we have to do is listen to the rantings of the representatives of Russia and its satellites in the United Nations, and we know that they twist all facts to suit their purpose. The policy of "the big lie" is staring us in the face again, and all for the same vicious purpose.

If we must fight this cancer in the world body alone, then let us face the fact squarely. If we are going to have help from our allies, let us make certain that this help is sincere and effective, and can actually be given.

These are facts which we must discover today—a year from today it may be too late.

Winston Churchill, in his book, Their Finest Hour, reports the conversation with General Gamelin, Commander in Chief of the French Armies, on May 15, 1941. The general had reported the breakthrough north and south of Sedan and the rush of German armor toward the coast of Abbeville. When the General stopped talking Winston Churchill asked:

"Where is the strategic reserve?"

General Gamelin turned and with a shake of the head, and a shrug, said:

"Aucune"—None.

"I was dumbfounded. It had never occurred to me that any commanders having to defend 500 miles of engaged front would have left themselves unprovided with a mass of maneuver."

Gentlemen, we can take heed of Mr. Churchill's words. We are engaged on a global front, and we are expending our strategic reserve in a series of local actions. We cannot permit this to go on.

I have great confidence in our American soldiers, and in our great industrial machine behind them. I should like to point out that our great plants are doing a magnificent job, turning out the finished products we need to reequip our armed services. I should like to pay special tribute to men like Larry Bell, who have lived with this situation night and day, to expedite the entire program. People like Mr. Bell have given more of their nerve and sinew than it seems that the human body can stand—but thanks to great men like him we shall succeed.

Gentlemen, the decisions which we are making in these grave days shall not affect only ourselves or a portion of our people. These decisions will affect freedom-loving people throughout the world, and our posterity.

God grant that we make these decisions right, conserve our strength, strengthen our sinews, and then if we must, strike decisively.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, whom we seek in vain without unless we first find Thee within, at this noontide altar of prayer may the hush of Thy presence fall upon our souls. Quiet our minds of their fretting, allay the unhappy irritations and resentments of our spirits, and hallow our lives with the grace of contrition and humility. Strengthen our hearts and minds that we may worthily measure up to the role Thou hast called us to play in these solemn days.

We cry, O Lord, in the night of the world's darkness that Thy light may rise in glory for all the earth. By the sorrows of the uprooted refugees, by the long agony of battlefield and hospital, by the woes of mothers, the needs of desolate children, and the starvation of millions, we pray that this archenemy of man, this most blasphemous denier of all that is good and just, the curse of aggressive war, may be driven from the earth. As those who work for reconciliation and brotherhood, give us a place among the peacemakers of this stricken generation. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 17, 1951, was dispensed with.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the Senator-elect from Pennsylvania, the Honorable JAMES H. DUFF, is present and ready to take the oath of office. His certificate of election has already been presented to the Senate and spread on the minutes thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator-elect will come forward, the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. DUFF, escorted by Mr. MARTIN, advanced to the desk, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the Vice President.

GREETINGS FROM THE SENATE TO GOVERNOR FINE AND OTHER PENNSYLVANIANS

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a group of Pennsylvanians in the galleries be permitted to rise, and that I may have the privilege of presenting the new Governor of Pennsylvania, Hon. John H. Fine.

Pennsylvania is very proud to be known as the arsenal of democracy. These people represent the 4,000,000 men and women required in Pennsylvania to man our factories, and mines, our forests, our farms, and our methods of transportation. I ask the privilege of presenting Governor Fine, and having Pennsylvanians in the galleries rise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. So far as the Chair knows, it has never been customary or necessary to give unanimous consent for Pennsylvanians to rise anywhere they are. [Laughter.] Without objection, Pennsylvanians in the galleries and the Governor will rise and be greeted by the Senate.

[The Pennsylvanians in the galleries, together with Governor Fine, rose and were greeted by the Senate with prolonged applause.]

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed order. I ask that it be read, and that the Senate proceed immediately to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed order, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. DUFF be, and he is hereby, assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia and to service on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and that the name of Mr. DUFF be placed on the list of assignments to the Committee on the District of Columbia following the name of Mr. BENNETT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order is agreed to.

BOARD OF REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair reappoints the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE ECONOMIC REPORT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] a member of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, to fill an existing vacancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to fill an existing vacancy.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to present petitions and memorials, introduce bills and resolutions, and submit routine matters for the RECORD without debate and without making speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LETTER AND RESOLUTIONS OF BLUE LAKE PACKERS, INC., SALEM, OREG.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Junior Eckley, secretary of the Blue Lake Packers, Inc., of Salem, Oreg., enclosing two resolutions adopted by that cooperative, which, in my opinion, deserve reading by Members of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the resolutions be appropriately referred, and that the letter and resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the letter and resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter presented by Mr. MORSE is as follows:

BLUE LAKE PACKERS, INC.,
Salem, Oreg., December 20, 1950.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I am enclosing herewith copy of a resolution which was passed by our membership at their annual membership meeting held here in Salem, Oreg., on Monday, December 18, and which pertains to the matter of war-risk insurance.

There is enclosed also copy of a second resolution which was adopted by our membership and which pertains to the matter of farm labor.

We are confident that you, as a member of Oregon's congressional delegation, will assist in whatever way possible to formulate and expedite passage of equitable legislation dealing with both of these subjects. We, as representatives of a farmers' cooperative, can assure the Congress of the fullest cooperation in this time of national emergency.

Yours sincerely,

BLUE LAKE PACKERS, INC.,
JUNIOR ECKLEY, Secretary.

The first resolution presented by Mr. MORSE was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

Whereas the members of this cooperative association, who are engaged in the production, processing, and marketing of canned, frozen, and dehydrated vegetables and fruits, in the central Willamette Valley of the State of Oregon, own plant buildings and equipment valued conservatively at $2,500,000 and located in Salem, Polk County, Oreg.; and

Whereas the war risk exclusion clause presently incorporated in each of the current insurance policies protecting the facility investment of this association automatically eliminates protection upon, and eliminates liability for, loss caused directly or indirectly, by hostile or warlike action in time of peace or war; and

Whereas the international situation presently involves the United States of America with immediate and continuing risk of destructive attack upon the continental United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the membership of this association, in annual meeting assembled, does hereby respectfully solicit the individual and collective efforts and support of Oregon's congressional delegation, to exercise every means within their power to secure immediate passage of War Damage Corporation Act—H. R. 9130, or similar act which, in its effect, shall adequately protect the interest of this association, and all other businesses, for the duration of this peril.

The second resolution presented by Mr. MORSE was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, as follows:

Whereas the national emergency portends the enactment of more stringent requirements in relation to the drafting of young men into the Armed Forces of the United States of America; and

Whereas farmers and farm production and marketing associations are dependent, in a major degree, on the services of young men within the present draft age brackets, in the planting, growing, harvesting, and processing of vitally important food crops and products; and

Whereas unrestricted drafting of these young men would, without question, imperil orderly and adequate production of all agricultural commodities, by withdrawing countless thousands of much needed manpower from the farm labor pool: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the members of Blue Lake Packers, Inc., Salem, Oreg., and in annual meeting assembled, That we do hereby respectfully solicit the assistance and support of the Oregon congressional delegation, to exercise their good influences to bring about enactment of such manpower legislation as shall incorporate reasonable and just consideration of the importance of adequate farm labor, and that such legislation shall further incorporate reasonable and flexible deferments where it is made apparent and obvious that nondeferment would work a hardship on the agricultural industry.

RESOLUTIONS OF OREGON RECLAMATION CONGRESS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the secretary of the Oregon Reclamation Congress together with resolutions adopted by that congress at its thirty-eighth annual meeting held in Klamath Falls on November 8, 9, and 10, 1950.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON RECLAMATION CONGRESS,
Portland, Oreg., December 19, 1950.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I am enclosing herewith copies of resolutions passed at the thirty-eighth annual meeting of the Oregon Reclamation Congress held in Klamath Falls, November 8, 9, and 10, 1950.

I am certain that all of these resolutions will be of interest to you as they express the views and thinking of Oregon irrigation leaders on numerous questions of interest. However, I want to particularly call your attention to resolutions Nos. 2, 3, 7, 8, and 9, as they relate specifically to matters on the national level.

With very best regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

K. W. SAWYER,
Secretary.

Resolution 1

MULTIPLE-PURPOSE DEVELOPMENTS

Whereas the comprehensive, multiple-purpose development of our major river basins logically falls into four phases—planning, financing, construction, and operation; and

Whereas development of such comprehensive programs, necessary to serve the public interest by enhancing the well-being of the people through development and conservation of all land and water resources, results in innumerable problems; and

Whereas adequate consideration of all resource potentials has not always been given in the planning phase of multiple-purpose projects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon Reclamation Congress endorse the principle of multiple-purpose development but urge that they be planned and put into effect by joint and coordinated action of existing agencies of government in accordance with a prompt and practical time schedule and in such a way as to insure: (1) Adequate consideration of all resource potentials in each basin such as irrigation, drainage, power, flood control, fish and wildlife, recreation, navigation, soil conservation, watershed protection, and other related purposes as they contribute to the development of industry, agriculture, forestry, and (2) the proper participation of all local, State, and Federal interests in the planning and consummation of such developments; be it further

Resolved, That the National Reclamation Association is hereby requested to adopt a resolution in conformity herewith.

Resolution 2

INTERSTATE DIVERSION OF WATER

Whereas Oregon is a State having great potentials for future logical development; and

Whereas much of this future development is dependent upon the supply of water now existing within the watercourses and watersheds of the State of Oregon; and

Whereas there have been statements on various occasions by high governmental officials indicating the possibility of diversion of Oregon waters to other watercourses or watersheds; and

Whereas it is conceivable that such diversion would interfere with the logical development of the areas of the State of Oregon lying within or adjacent to the watercourses or watersheds from which waters were diverted: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the following statement of belief be adopted as the position of the Oregon Reclamation Congress and the Oregon Association of Soil Conservation Districts:

"We believe that the water resources of a watercourse or watershed, where populations have become settled and where the potentials for future logical development are substantial, should be developed within and for the benefit of the inhabitants of such watershed and should not be diverted into other watersheds except by compact of the States involved.

"We believe that neither the Federal Government nor any of its agency elements should promote, encourage, suggest, or speculate in, nor should populations in present water-problem areas speculate with the possibility of diverting through huge Federal projects, waters from other watercourses in other States or regions, and we believe it to be important to the sound and orderly development of the water resources of the country, to the domestic tranquility of the people, and to the peace and security of the Nation, that it be basic in any national water resource policy that there shall be no diversion of waters from any watercourse or watershed in one State to another watercourse or watershed in another State except by compact of the States involved."

Resolution 3

CROOKED RIVER PROJECT

Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation has heretofore submitted to Congress for approval an over-all plan for the development of the irrigable lands in the Columbia River Basin and has proposed the establishment of a so-called basin account to make possible the fullest development of irrigable lands in the Pacific Northwest; and

Whereas the Bureau has listed for immediate construction only four small projects in Oregon, viz: Canby, Crooked River, The Dalles, and Bully Creek, and from present attitude of the residents in these proposed projects it is quite possible that only one or two of them will materialize; and

Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation for the past many years has made a study of the entire Crooked River basin and has set up three potential irrigation projects in the Crooked River watershed, viz: Paulina, 5,200 acres; Post, 14,500 acres; and Crooked River, 20,210 acres, but has only included one of these projects (Crooked River) in its proposal for immediate construction; and

Whereas it appears to be to the best interest of the people of the Crooked River Basin and of the State of Oregon as a whole, to have the entire Crooked River Basin project included for authorization by Congress at one time, so that a comprehensive plan for the development of the entire watershed can be worked out and the first units built so that when the plan is completed all of the waters of Crooked River will be conserved and put to the most beneficial use; and

Whereas this would require no additional appropriation at this time, as only the first unit (Crooked River) would be immediately constructed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Oregon Reclamation Congress, meeting at Klamath Falls, Oreg., this 9th day of November, 1950, go on record favoring the immediate authorization of the Crooked River Basin project, including the Paulina, Post, and Crooked River units, and urge the Bureau of Reclamation to substitute such a basin-wide project for the one heretofore submitted to Congress asking approval of the Crooked River project only; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded at once to the Secretary of the Interior, Commissioner of Reclamation, regional director of the Reclamation Bureau, and to members of the Oregon delegation in Congress, with the request that each take the necessary action to bring about this authorization by Congress of the Crooked River Basin project in its entirety with construction to follow in due course.

Resolution 4

GROUND WATER CODE

Whereas the rapid growth of population and of industrial or other development in Oregon is causing a greatly increased pressure on water supplies, both in the streams or lakes and in underground bodies; and

Whereas ground water bodies in the State can meet a substantial part of the ultimate water supply requirement and can be controlled by public administration under the principle of beneficial use; and

Whereas, in the absence of administrative control, the use of ground water bodies can become ruthlessly competitive with the result that the supply is seriously depleted for all; and

Whereas the existing ground water code in Oregon applies only to the part of the State which is east of the Cascade Range, and does not provide for its effective administration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon Reclamation Congress in session at its thirty-eighth annual meeting, That steps be taken to prepare a draft of legislation defining an adequate and comprehensive ground water code applicable to all the State and based on the principles that such waters are public, and a right to them is limited by the extent of beneficial use, and that priority of such right is determined by priority of such use; and be it further

Resolved, That such draft of legislation be prepared for submittal to the Oregon State Legislature that will convene in January 1953.

Resolution 5

EXTENSION OF WILLAMETTE BASIN COMMISSION LAW

Be it resolved, That the Oregon Reclamation Congress is in favor of the following changes in existing Oregon laws and requests that its legislative committee attempt to secure passage of the same at the next legislature.

1. The amendment of the Willamette Basin Commission law so that it shall apply to other watersheds in the State wherever interest therein is indicated.

2. The amendment of the irrigation district law to provide for five directors for such districts as desire the increased number.

Resolution 6

STATE DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Whereas a proposed bill has been prepared to create a State board of natural resources of nine divisions, which proposal would abolish the office of State engineer, the Oregon Reclamation Commission and State hydroelectric commission and substitute in lieu thereof a large unwieldly board with nine advisory boards and nine paid directors; and

Whereas said proposed bill will endanger our water code and all reclamation efforts in this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the thirty-eighth annual reclamation congress in regular session convened at Klamath Falls, Oreg., That we oppose the proposed Natural Resources Board for Oregon.

Resolution 7

PRESERVATION OF STATES' RIGHTS

Be it resolved, That the Oregon Reclamation Congress expresses as a statement of principle that established water rights must be protected and respected as they exist under the laws and traditions of the areas affected; that the administration of policies and objectives relating to sound land and water use can be best accomplished through existing units of government; that acreage limitations should be based on the economical farm units and the productivity of the land; and that there should be a maximum of local autonomy in the administration of all reclamation projects.

Resolution 8

SNOW SURVEY

Whereas irrigation agriculture in Oregon is dependent for its water supply upon surface streams and ground-water basins; and

Whereas the principal source of water for irrigation in Oregon is precipitation which falls on the mountain watersheds in the form of snow; and

Whereas advance knowledge of the flow of streams enables preparation for most effective use of stream flow and enables water users better to plan their seasonal operations; and

Whereas water-supply forecasts based on snow surveys, measurements of stream flow, and evaluation of ground-water sources have been used effectively for many years by Oregon water users and have demonstrated their value to members of this organization; and

Whereas the Federal Congress has supported stream-gaging and ground-water programs for many years, but is not supporting such programs sufficiently to meet the present needs or to meet unit costs of conducting the necessary surveys and water measurements: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon Reclamation Congress, That we recommend and urge the National Congress to increase the Federal support to the snow-survey program of the Division of Irrigation and Water Conservation, Soil Conservation Service, to the necessary degree, and urge similar increase of support to the Water Resources Division of the United States Geological Survey; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the congressional delegates of Oregon, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Director of the Budget, and to the Chief of the Soil Conservation Service, and to the Director of the United States Geological Survey.

Resolution 9

FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION
